William J. Gauthier, president of theMonson parent's organization, said an emergency board meeting is being called for Sunday to discuss the report and issue a statement.

"We're all for reform in any way that can make Monson a better facilty," Gauthier said. "We endorse any moves which will improve conditions at Monson or anywhere else in the state, but want to read the full report before making additional comments."

Full Diplomatic Ties Hinted In Peking

PEKING (AP)-After four closed-door sessions with Chou En-lai, President Nixon was described Friday at aiming at eventual restoration of full diplomatic relations between the United States and mainland China-whatever the repercussions in Taiwan.

An informed American source said Nixon and Henry A. Kissinger, the President's national security affairs adviser, are talking with Chou about big-picture issues involved in establishing what the premier has termed "normal state relations."

While the top American and Chinese leaders formulated broad policy, Secretary of State William P. Rogers, his Chinese counterpart Chi Peng-fe and their associates were working out nuts-and-bolts questions of how to effect summit policies.

While no U.S. officials involved in the talks would discuss matters of substance, there was good reason to believe Nixon and Chou had embarked on setting up cultural exchanges, limited tourism between the two countries, a system for handling Chinese-American trade and means for establishing regular contacts short of full diplomatic relations involving an exchange of ambassadors.

While no one would talk about the means likely to be employed in continuing the dialogue between the two nations on a diplomatic level, there would be precedent for establishing consular relations without setting up embassies. Britain, for example, has recognized mainland China for 22 years-but it continues to have a consulate on the Nationalist Chinese island of Taiwan.

One American in a position to know said Nixon ultimately seeks full and formal diplomatic ties with China's Communist government. However, he emphasized that the path in that direction would have to be navigated a step at a time.

Rogers and his Chinese counterpart, were conducting significant talks aimed at carrying the process forward in practical ways, this informant reported.

In the matter of diplomatic relations, the question of the Nationalists is not easy to resolve, since Nixon has said he has no intention of abandoning Taiwan.

Nixon spent three more hours Thursday in private conversations with Chou. In their four sessions, they have been together 12 hours, but much of this time was taken up with the translations of interpreters.

They meet again Friday. In all, Nixon and Chou have spent 24 hours together this week.

Presumably, somewhere along the line the vexing subject of Indochina has come up. Unless one side gives, little can be expected. Chou made plain before Nixon came to China that the U.S. peace plan was unacceptable. Nixon has said aspects of the Vietnam war were on the agenda.

In far off Paris, North Vietnam and the Viet Cong walked out on the peace talks Thursday, protesting recent U.S. bombings of North Vietnam. Conference sources saw the walkout as a token of North Vietnam's independent stance in any bargaining between Nixon and Chou on Indochina.

Thursday evening Chou was host in the General Hall of the People to the Nixons and members of their party at a two-hour dinner. The menu featured Peking duck, China's most vaunted delicacy.

Presumably, Chou and Nixon exchanged toasts, but what they said was not known because the American press was excluded from the private dinner. As a consolation prize the leaders of China's official press treated visiting reporters to a duck dinner at the Restaurant of All Combined Virtues.

Friday is the Nixons last day in Peking, before going on to Hangchow and Shanghai. The Chinese arranged for them to visit Peking's Forbidden City, a 65-year-old royal enclave now known as the former imperial palaces.

Once reserved for emperors and their families and servants, the enclave totaling more than 9,000 rooms is described by the government as demonstrating "the wisdom, talent and highly accomplished building technique of China's ancient laboring people."

This made the second day of sightseeing for Nixon. On Thursday he cast aside the cares of state to see the Great Wall of China, built 2,200 years ago to keep out barbarians.

From the ramparts and looking away to where the wall stretches to the far horizon, Nixon in a philosophic mood observed that there should be an end to "Walls of any kind between peoples."

Implicit in his statement was a hope that he could pierce the wall of hostility that has been erected between the two nations since Mao Tse-tung came to power in 1949.

Nixon looked at the massive Da Ling Gate on a nearby mountain and continued: "We will not climb that mountain today. We are already meeting at the summit in Peking."

The words were addressed to Deputy Premier Li Hsien-nien, who with Foreign Minister Chi Peng-fei accompanied the presidential party on the tour. Li thanked Nixon for "a great speech" and added: "The American people are a great people."

Nixon used a visit to the nearby burial vaults of the Ming emperors to express a hope that many Americans will have a chance to visit China.

"We have not known Asia well enough," he commented. "Communications have been badly neglected."

A sour view of this week's proceedings came from William F. Buckley Jr., editor of the conservative National Review. He is in the press party in Peking despite his announcement last July he was suspending support of Nixon because of the President's China Policy.

Asked what he thought the trip had accomplished, he replied: "Well, I think it is much easier to talk about what hasn't been accomplished....All the rhetoric to which we and others have been subjected has been a rhetoric that stresses friendship between the American and Chinese people. Now, in the first place, there was no lack of friendship that I know of between the people.

In Brief...

Foreign Aid Bill Passed

WASHINGTON (AP)-The House today passed a $3.2-billion money appropriation for foreign aid and related agencies-the last step in Congress' four-month foreign aid battle-and sent it to the Senate for final action.

Sen. William Proxmire indicated the Senate might vote on sending the bill to President Nixon before the end of the day.

Hormones Linked to Intelligence

WASHINGTON (AP)-A medical scientist reports evidence suggesting that a genetic or accidental excess of certain sex-related hormones in prenatal life may increase significantly the intelligence of the child.

Dr. John Money said he has found "a remarkably high proportion of individuals with high IQ" in a group of children and adults known to have experienced such excess hormone exposure while still in their mothers' wombs.

Kennedy Back in U.S.

BOSTON (AP)-A gaunt and smiling Joseph Kennedy III arrived in Boston Thursday, ending a three-day adventure that began when his plane was commandeered by five Arab hijackers.

Kennedy, 19, son of the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, was greeted at the airport by his mother Ethel; his older sister, Kathleen; a younger brother, Courtney, and a dozen friends.

Curb on Bussing Passed

WASHINGTON (AP)-The Senate Thursday adopted the Mansfield-Scott compromise amendment designed to put some limits on school busing for desegregation purposes but to allow it when local school officials approve.

The compromise proposal offered by the two Senate leaders was denounced by Southern Democrats and others opposed to busing as worthless and a hoax.

U.S. To Recognize Bangladesh Soon

RAWALPINDI, Pakistan (AP)-The United States has told President Zulfikar Ali Bhutto it plans to recognize Bangladesh, informed Pakistani and American sources said Thursday.

The sources said Bhutto was assured Washington will not announce its recognition before the end of February. Given this promise, they added, Bhutto raised no objection.

The announcement presumably would not come until after President Nixon returns from his visit to China.

In Washington, a State Department spokesman said the question of U.S. recognition of Bangladesh is still under "active review" without a decision having been reached. He recalled that President Nixon said before his China trip that a decision would be made in March.

There was no official comment from the Pakistan government or from the U.S. Embassy in Islamabad, the official capital neighboring Rawalpindi.

Kleindienst Approved

WASHINGTON (AP)-Without a dissenting vote Thursday the Senate Judiciary Committee approved President Nixon's nomination of Richard G. Kleindienst to be attorney general

The 13-0 vote, with three committee members absent, opened the way for Senate confirmation next week of the conservative 48-year-old Arizonan, now the deputy attorney general.

He is to succeed Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell, who has resigned effective March 1 to direct Nixon's re-election campaign.

The committee also unanimously approved the nomination of L. Patrick Gray of New London, Conn., now an assistant attorney general, to take Kleindienst's place as the No. 2 man in the Justice Department.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D—Mass., and other liberal Democrats on the committee who have been critical of the department's policies in the field of civil rights and individual liberties, joined in recommending Kleindienst's confirmation.

Kleindienst, who has been a persistent and at times controversial champion of these policies, indicated in two days of hearings on his nomination that critics could expect no major changes if he were confirmed.

Federal "Bugs" Challenged

WASHINGTON (AP)—Attempts by the Nixon administration to remove judicial checks from electronic eavesdropping of domestic groups could lead to the political persecution of anyone who disagreed with the President, the Supreme Court was told Thursday.

"The power which the attorney general seeks here would legitimize a wide-spread dragnet of political opposition," attorney Arthur Kiney told the high court. "That's what they're asking for here-the power to suspend constitutional guarantees."

Both Kiney and Justice Department attorney Robert C. Mardian appeared before the high court Thursday to debate whether federal agents may "bug" domestic groups suspected of subversion without first getting approval from a neutral judge.

The U.S. circuit court in Cincinnati has ruled that the Fourth Amendment prohibits governmental surveillance of American citizens without prior court approval. The Justice Department is appealing.

The department argued the President can take whatever actions he deems necessary to accomplish his constitutional mandate to insure domestic tranquility and protect the country from foreign and domestic enemies.

Both sides agree the government may use whatever surveillance it finds necessary against foreign enemies but they split over whether this surveillance can be extended to domestic foes without violating the constitutional ban against unreasonable searches and seizures.

Kiney told the high court Thursday the televised remarks of Presidential aide H. R. Haldeman several weeks ago pointed up a problem in giving a politician the final decision over who should be watched.

Haldeman accused opponents of President Nixon's war policy of consciously aiding and abetting the enemy.

"Would these critics be included in the scope of domestic surveillance?" Kiney asked, adding sarcastically "They are aiding and abetting the enemy."

He told the court affirmation of the Justice Department's position would "erase the Fourth Amendment from the domestic life of this country" and would lead to a "stifling of the political freedoms guaranteed by the First Amendment.

Mardian earlier had told the court the attorney general best could decide who should be placed under surveillance because he had access to all the information-gathering facilities of the government.

The case before the high court involves government wiretapping of a conversation involving Lawrence Plamundon, a White Panther accused of bombing a Central Intelligence Agency office at Ann Arbor, Mich.

Both the U.S. district court judge and the circuit court ruled the wiretap was unconstitutional because it was not approved by a court.

Walk-Out At Paris

PARIS (AP)-North Vietnam, with a wary eye on the Peking summit meeting, led a Communist walkout from the Vietnam peace talks Thursday and the future of the conference remained in doubt.

The action was said to be a protest against recent U.S. bombings and other "extremely serious acts of war" against North Vietnam.

But it also appeared that North Vietnam and the Viet Cong, who joined in the walkout, wanted to underline their independence in dealing with the United States at a time when rumors flew that Vietnam may have been one of the subjects discussed by President Nixon and Chinese leaders in Peking.

North Vietnam and the Viet Cong have insisted that Communist China is solidly behind them in their peace proposals and their contention that the war must be settled at the Paris conference. This has been their answer to questions as to whether they feared the Chinese and Americans might try to settle the war behind their backs in Peking.

The United States and South Vietnam charged that the Communist delegates violated long-established conference procedural rules in walking out of a meeting before all delegates had finished speaking.

The meeting lasted 17 minutes, the shortest of the 145 sessions held since the talks began Jan. 25, 1969.

Freed Berrigan Renews Crusade

DANBURY, Conn. (AP)-Daniel Berrigan, the pacifist priest, released from prison Thursday after serving 18 months for destroying draft records says he will press his crusade against the Vietnam war.

"The war is still the first fact of life for the living," he said. "There is no issue conparable to the death of the innocent-not the economy, not good fellowship in China, not cancer."

But the 51-year-old Jesuit said he would shun the methods of protest that put him in jail.

Rejecting the use of violence if it meant doing physical and psychological damage to human beings, he said: "I would do immense physical and psychological damage to draft records if this were the right tactical moment, but it is not."

Berrigan, wearing a cross made by a fellow prisoner, appeared graying but chipper despite various illnesses as he emerged from the prison. He smiled broadly to the cheers of 200 supporters who had waited in 15-degree weather outside the federal prison.

After embracing his brother, Jerome, he turned and waved to prisoners huddled around the prison windows.

Berrigan went first to an ecumenical service at a nearby church then to Syracuse, N.Y., for a visit with his mother. He plans to live at the Jesuits' Woodstock College in New York City.

The poet and writer won parole halfway through a three-year term for destroying draft records at Catonsville, Md., in 1968.

Also jailed for the Catonsville protest was his brother Philip, a Josephite priest now one of seven defendants on trial in Harrisburg, Pa., for alleged conspiracy to kidnap presidential adviser Henry A. Kissinger and for other antiwar plots.

Daniel Berrigan originally was named an unindicted co-conspirator in the Harrisburg case, but his name was later removed.

Berrigan was asked at a news conference if he gained anything from prison life. He replied: "More gray hair and more bright thoughts."

Berrigan was said to be troubled by an ulcer and a hernia and reportedly suffered an adverse reaction to novocain while undergoing dental treatment at a prison last summer.

Davis Claims "Victory"

SAN JOSE, Calif. (AP)-A beaming Angela Davis said Thursday she feels better than she's felt in the last 16 months and called her freedom on bail Wednesday "a victory for the people."

The 28-year-old Communist and former UCLA philosophy instructor told a crowded news conference that "a larger victory in my own case has to be attained." She referred to her trial Monday on murder, kidnap and conspiracy charges.

Miss Davis, in a brief statement, said she was "deeply grateful" for sacrifices by her supporters to gain her freedom. She said she regretted not being able to thank them all personally because of a court order banning her participation in public gatherings.

The black militant said her freedom was "a victory for the people not only in the sense that political prisoners cannot now be held indefinitely in jail in an attempt to "break their will to fight."

She said the California Supreme Court ruling that held capital punishment unconstitutional would not have been possible without the struggles surrounding the prison movement, the "Massacre at Attica... and the murder of George Jackson."

"We have to intensify the effort to free all political prisoners," she said, and singled out the Soledad Brothers among others. Two Soledad Brothers, accused of helping Jackson kill a prison guard, are on trial in San Francisco.

Miss Davis answered only two questions from newsmen. To one about her health, she responded: "I feel fine. I feel better than I have in 16 months. The real reason I feel better now is that I can give more of myself to help my brothers and sisters."

Throughout the news conference, Miss Davis, wearing a green knit dress, striped shawl and large silver earrings, beamed at newsmen and about 50 supporters packed into the storefront office of the National United Committee for Free Angela Davis.

American Communist party chairman Gus Hall, scheduled to be at the news conference, was delayed by a late flight.

Miss Davis, freed Wednesday night on $102,500 bail, earlier canceled a planned visit to the trial of the Soledad Brothers, whom she is accused of plotting to set free.

A spokesman for the National United Committee said the trip was canceled because "there was too much of a chance it would violate the court order" granting her bail.

The order signed by Superior Court Judge Richard E. Arnason, who will preside at Miss Davis' murder, kidnap and conspiracy trial which starts Monday, prohibits her from attending public rallies or meetings without prior court permission.

The committee had announced that Miss Davis would attend the trial. That announcement was made Wednesday night two hours after she was freed from the Santa Clara County Jail in Palo Alto, about 20 miles north of here.

Committee spokesman Stephanie Allan said Miss Davis and her supporters discussed the matter into the early morning hours and decided to ask Arnason's permission first so as not to jeopardize her freedom.

Miss Davis is accused of furnishing four guns and helping plot the abortive escape attempt at the Marin County Civic Center Aug. 7, 1970, in which a judge and three others were killed. The prosecution contends the escape try was part of a plot to free the Soledad Brothers, three black convicts charged with the murder of a white prison guard Jan. 16, 1970.

Convict-author George Jackson, one of the three, was killed last August in violence at San Quentin Prison. John Clutchette and Fleeta Drumgo, the two survivors, have been on trial in San Francisco since December.

Miss Davis, who had been working actively to free the Soledad Brothers before the Aug. 7, 1970 shootout, spent her first hours of freedom at a large dinner party.

Rodger McAfee, 33, a partner in a farm cooperative who put up 405 acres of farm land near Fresno as collateral for Miss Davis' $100,000 surety bond, said the evening "culminated 16 months of struggle."

McAfee, who placed a gross value of $330,000 on the acreage, was at the jail when Miss Davis was freed. He said he put up the collateral because "promoting the issue of Angela Davis" is "the most important thing in the world I could be doing right now."

Capsule Has First Space Letter

CAPE KENNEDY, Fla. (AP)-On the remote chance that intelligent outer space creatures might one day find it wandering in space, a spacecraft scheduled for launch Sunday will carry a plaque that tells in scientific symbols where and when it was launched and by what kind of beings.

Included on the Pioneer 10 plaque are the naked figures of a man and woman, the man's right hand raised in a gesture of friendliness.

In order to get the message, members of another civilization would have to capture the payload.

Space agency officials said the odds are slim that anyone will find it. But they note that Pioneer 10 is the first man-made object intended to escape our solar system and that it will travel through other galaxies for millions of years, perhaps for eternity. No one knows for certain if other civilization thrive out there.

The main mission of Pioneer 10 is to be the first spacecraft to probe the planet Jupiter, the largest in the solar system with more than 1,000 times the volume of earth. To reach this distant planet, the payload will be rocketed away from earth at 32,000 miles per hour, nearly 8,000 miles faster than any previous space vehicle.

Launch time Sunday is 8:52.

A Look At Continuous War, Remember 'Nam?

By STEVE SCHMIDT

Wednesday afternoon the Student Mobilization Committee held a Teach-In on the continuing war in Indo-China. The small size of the crowd testified to the fact that most UMass students either believe that the Nixon Administration is actually "winding down" the War or that there is nothing new for them to learn from such gatherings. The speakers, however, told quite a different story. Dick Minear, of the History Dept. Jules Chametzky of the English Dept. and Mike Best of the Economics Dept. all gave their impressions of the political, moral, and economic implications of the continuing and actually expanding war in Southeast Asia.

A slide show entitled "The Automated Air War" distributed by the American Friends Service Committee and narrated by Frank Dorman, a local clergyman, followed the speakers. This presentation graphically showed that not only is the war continuing, but that it has entered a whole new phase.

Utilizing miniature sensors connected to a bank of computers the Air Force is able to bomb individual villages or even persons by an automated "remote control." These sensors, of course, cannot distinguish between friend and foe and the bombs do not distinguish between men, women, and children.

The planes at upper left are part of the air war in IndoChina which has increased while the ground war has been lessened. The results of such bombings are shown at lower left. In the upper right are the "Pineapple" (left) and the "Guava" (right). These are both anti-personnel bombs which, upon explosion, spread hundreds of steel pellets flying in all directions. Human flesh is the only "military target" damaged by these weapons. The boy at lower right was a victim of similar anti-personnel bomblets. General Westmoreland, pictured below, was instrumental in establishing the automated air war so as to cut losses of U.S. troops while continuing the war. (Photo compilation by Steve Schmidt)

Belchertown - New Programs Unused

By JAMES M. SHANKS

The cost of keeping a person at the Belchertown State School is $3800 per year, or $250,000 over a lifetime -a lifetime of being treated as something less than human.

There are alternative programs which keep a retarded child in the community. Some of these help make him functioning member of society, often able to earn his own support, which cost one-fourth of that amount-or about $1000 per year.

But the programs are faltering. And the General Court is to blame because it has not appropriated funds to develop them.

Some are already operating, but under the level needed because of lack of funds. Others are being held up because the legislators have not assigned them a high priority.

The "new wave" of mental retardation treatment revolves around early diagnosis of retardation. Also brought into play are nursery schools and day care centers, special public school classes, sheltered workshops, and eventually community work and living centers.

These plans call for Belchertown-a modified Belchertown-to be used only as a last resort, a long term total care center for those persons so severely retarded they cannot live in the community even with special care and services.

Because of the apparent lack of concern by the Commonwealth, private agencies such as the Hampden County Association for Retarded Children and Sunshine Village have also been forced to offer alternate programs and provide services normally supplied by the state.

The difference between Belchertown and a community program such as the nursery schools is so marked as to be shocking.

The programs are under the jurisdiction of the Department of Mental Health-just as is Belchertown. But regulations require at least one teacher or assistant for each six pupils and a maximum of 12 pupils per school.

The children at a nursery school and at Belchertown are the same-retarded-but conditions are like day and night.

Every child receives individual attention, and lots of it. His problems are worked with, he is stimulated, plays with educational playthings, is encouraged to be creative and advance in any way possible.

Unlike the kids at Belchertown, these children are not starved for affection because they live at home and receive love and attention at nursery school as well. When a visitor enters they are curious. But they don't run to embrace him as they do at the institution.

The children at the Belchertown State School for the retarded are often forced to live in an environment which often resembles the type of atmosphere found in a prison. (photo by Vinnie D'Addario)

There are strict qualifications for the teachers. Education and experience and essential-but so are a love of children and an ability to deal with them on their level of understanding.

Seven nursery schools are in operation in Region 1, two in Springfield, one each in Holyoke, Westfield, Pittsfield, Chicopee and Amherst. Money for an additional seven was requested from the legislature last year. None was received.

In Hampden County, one nursery school is paid for by the state. The Hampden County Association for Retarded Children pays generally for the rent, insurance, telephone service, food, equipment and a teacher aide at the other four in the county.

The state pays for the teacher, sometimes an assistant.

But of a total budget for the nursery schools in the county, the Association pays $40,000, the state $18,000, to operate state facilities.

Nursery school for retarded children is similar to that for a normal child, but tailored to special needs. Experimental play, a formal teaching period (called "story time"), snack, rest period and outdoor play make up the schedule five mornings per week.

Table manners and eating skills are taught at snack time. Talking, colors and the world around the child are learned during story time. Play periods with educational toys helps coordination and mental development. Art teaches coordination and expression. Outdoor play develops muscles and coordination.

From nursery school, the children are able to go on to special classes for the retarded in the public schools. The children are prepared for school, but there are only seven nursery schools. The most optimistic-or lowest-estimate of the number needed for the area is 21.

If a child is too retarded or emotionally disturbed to be admitted to public school at the age of seven, he can go to a day care center until he is 17. If there is a day care center.

These centers are limited to an enrollment of 12 also, but the maximum teacher-pupil ratio is one to four.

Most of the children at Day Care I in Springfield, located in a church basement, did not attend nursery school. They tend to be more retarded-an indication of the success of nursery schools.

Some will be able to go to work in sheltered workshops. Others will eventually be forced to go into an institution such as Belchertown because no community supervised living quarters are available.

Each year a child attends a nursery school or day care center it costs someone-in theory the state-$1000. But the state is saved $2800 over the cost of Belchertown.

If a child can go to nursery school he is many times less likely to end up in Belchertown. If the state eventually builds group living centers and a solid network of sheltered workshops is established the Massachusetts stands to save about $200,000 over one person's lifetime.

Public school "special education" classes have been expanding and improving over the years but many school superintendents seem reluctant to commit themselves to these programs.

Many schools have been accused of using their "special classes" as dumping grounds for unruly students, discipline problems and blacks.

Dr. M. Phillip Wakstein, former regional director of retardation for the Department of Mental Health, told of one New York superintendent who said he used his special classes as an aid to teacher recruitment.

"He told them," Wakstein said, "that their classe would have no troblemakers, only mostly white youngsters. The others were placed in the special classes."

Springfield has been accused of the same practices.

Although the state will pay about 50 per cent of the costs of special education classes, Wakstein says the money is often used to reduce the costs of the classes to nothing instead of for enrichment and tailoring them to the special needs of the retarded.

Because of the abdication of financial responsibility for programs, private agencies have taken on added burdens, or shouldered the entire responsibility in some cases.

Sunshine Village

Sunshine Village in Chicopee is just such an example.

"Friends of the Retarded Children" incorporated in July of 1967 as a non-profit agency with goals of meeting area needs.

Sunshine Village is the result, a large many - faceted building complex on Litwin Lane in Chicopee Falls next to the Litwin School. With volunteer labor and contributions, more than $500,00 of facilities have been constructed.

Included are two large heated swimming pools, a multipurpose building, ball diamonds and classrooms.

A summer recreation program was operated ther last year, and is due to begin shortly this spring.

Retarded individuals are trained for work, or employed at Sunshine Village, both producing and earning income. The Chicopee School Department is also cooperating in educational programs at Sunshine Village.

Mothers Are Helped

On of the main goals is to enable a retarded child to have some kind of recreation and learning experience-at the same time giving the mother some relief from the daily burden of care.

Those few hours a child is in a program can often make the difference between a family keeping the child at home and sending him to Belchertown.

This lack of relief for parents is another reason the nursery schools and day care centers are needed in the area. If the parents can be relieved from the burden of care for a few hours, for rest, shopping, doing housework or whatever, the physical and emotional drains of caring for a retarded child are reduced immensely.

Centers for the early diagnosis of retardation are also a primary need according to Wakstein and Dr. Gunnar Dybwad, consultant to the President's Committee for Mental Retardation.

Because a child's most rapid period of learning is between birth and the time he enters school, preschool programs are vital if the child is to stay out of an institution.

The child can't be placed in these programs without knowing if he is retarded. Some children who appear retarded may instead be deaf, have learning or perceptual difficulties, or emotional problems which look like retardation.

Wakstein has requested a team of 14 people be transferred to Springfield as the nucleus of a proposed regional diagnostic and community service center. The jobs were created by the legislature in 1964 as an outpatient department for Belchertown-but the people have not been hired yet.

As it now stands, privat organizations pay for and furnish the services the state should and technically does provide, while the legislature complains about finances and appropriates little money for the retarded, "the forgotten people of the Commonwealth."

Healy In Chicago?

In a manner reminiscent of Chicago in 1968, President Wood and his Board of Trustees held its February meeting. There were plenty of police to ensure that the Board meeting would be held, and plenty of verbiage to ensure that the issues would never be discussed. Whe discussing the tactics used at Wednesday's meeting, it would be helpful to remember that the distinguished President was a member of LBJ's cabinet when the 1968 Democratic Convention was held.

I don't think that it is all that absurd to draw a parallel between the two for the cases are extremely similar, even though one was on a smaller scale than the other. Three groups appeared before the Board that day. Actually they were given an audience, as Chairman Healy so quaintly put it. He said that the Board would not be holding a public hearing and that the Board would conduct its normal business. This was an obvious over-reaction to last month's show. He even referred to the students and faculty who had come to the meeting as the "audience" in what would seem to be a preparation for the theatre that would follow. The Board, like the Democrats in Chicago, tried to ignore what the people were saying to them and what the people wanted the Board to do.

Part of the problem at that meeting of the Board was that at least two of the groups didn't know how to approach the trustees. They didn't realize that decisions are made by the President and the other members of the administration before it ever reaches the Board. It is there where the mistakes were made. The groups should never have come to the Board, simply because the administration would never be overruled by them. Even when the Board was confronted with the fact that they are rubber stamps for the President, they refused to admit it. This was dramatized when a Boston University professor raised a question concerning the Salzman case and the President, while avoiding the question, told the Board how to act. The professor, in an unusual display of honesty, turned to the "audience" and said, "Do you see how the President is trying to tell the Board how to vote? But even when confronted with the fact and the whole sham out in the open, the President chose to answer in more rhetoric and cover up his previous bullshit with more.

The entire meeting was like an Arthur Miller play. The Vets, who were there to protest military recruiting on the Boston campus, were not prepared for the Board dealing with them in any manner. But of course the Board wouldn't really deal with them, they would just tolerate them. The Board placed them at the bottom of the agenda, and told them that the Board had more important business to accomplish. But even with that feeble attempt at placating the Vets, the Vets didn't know quite which way to turn, so they did the democratic thing, and decided to vote.

The outcome of the vote was to disrupt immediately. The spokesman for the group got up and in a loud voice told the Chairman that the group wanted to speak now, not at the end. The Chairman, in his usual paternalistic way, told them to be good boys and girls and wait until the grown-ups had finished the important business. Now this is where the theatre of the absurd came in. Firstly, the Vets had decided in a democratic manner what they were going to do, while the grown-ups were running their oligarchy at the front of the room. Secondly, the Vets started to give their presentation while the meeting, which the Chairman and the President insisted would go on, went on. So at the same time, in the same room, if you can imagine it, there were two meetings going on.

Meanwhile, outside of the meeting room there were at least 14 armed police keeping the students who had come to speak and listen in order. Inside there was one policeman guarding the door and two plainclothesmen keeping an eye on things. Very spontaneously, a girl from the back of the room said that she thought that the people outside should be let into the room. The Chairman solemnly stated that there were "health regulations" that had to be upheld and that the room was filled to capacity. Then the girl pointed out that there was plenty of room for administrators, the press, and the police but there was no room for the students and faculty who had come to deliberate with them. The Chairman kindly pointed out that that's the way it is baby, and if you don't like it, leave.

But after this incident the Chairman conceded that maybe those three goups should be heard after all, and so the Vets started their rap all over again. They said that by letting military recruiters on campus they were supporting the war. He condemned Chairman Healy for upholding the "health regulations" of the Commonwealth while in the same voice supporting the vehicles that kill 300 South East Asians a day. He told the Board that they were afraid to face what could be Blackballing from Federal funds, by supporting the UM/B Senate's stand. To this the Chairman replied that there was nothing he could do about the war. Then the speaker suggested that the Chairman was more concerned about his banks than the Asians that were dying. To this the Chairman delivered a homily about the moral attitudes of the Board and how much they hated the war. And the question of recruiting still remains unanswered.

But the problem is deeper than what happened at Wednesday's meeting. Wednesday was only a symptom of a sickness that has plagued the University for about a year. Surely the Trustees cannot be solely blamed for the outcome of the meeting. They didn't pick the high-security building for the meeting, nor did they pick the small room where it was held. They were not largely responsible for the 16-odd police present. They cannot be blamed for being kept ignorant of the feelings of the UM/B faculty and students about military recruitment on campus and for the conditions in Dorchester. Surely no one can blame them for allowing the Salzman case to drag on for three years. But you can blame them for hiring the administrators who would allow that to happen. You can blame them for sitting by and allowing students and faculty from the University to be treated with abuse. You can blame them for not fulfilling their obligations to the Commonwealth and the Citizens of the Commonwealth by allowing their rights to be abrogated. You can blame them for not giving the students and faculty a fair hearing--a fair hearing as defined by the faculty and students, not by the Trustees.

Wednesday's Trustee meeting depressed me and made me irate. Depressed to think that this type of thing could happen in a University which is dedicated to hearing every side and allowing reason to prevail. Irate to think that those people sitting piously in the front of the room didn't even understand why the students and faculty needed to disrupt the meeting to be heard. They are so lost in mush that they can't hear, see, or feel any longer. The President and his Board of Trustees have never handled anything so badly. But it seems that this method of keeping the "radicals and masses" in line will continue, for just remember what kind of president we have in President Wood.

Zero Population

WASHINGTON --The latest news from the Census Bureau is that younger women are refusing to have children, and the United States is fast approaching a "zero population growth" rate. This means the death rate and birthrate figures in the country will soon be even.

Disturbed by this information, I sought out three young ladies in a coffeehouse to find out what had gone wrong. Their names were Fern, Clara and Mary Jane, and they were sitting with three boys--Harry, Fred, and Claude.

"Ladies," I said, "I have just read in the newspapers that women in this country only had an average of 2.4 children in 1971 as opposed to 2.9 children in 1967, and if the trend continues they will be down to 2.1 in a few years which could mean zero population growth. How can you explain it?"

"Who wants kids?", Fern asked.

"But," I said, "that is the role of women--to reproduce their own kind."

"That's the point," Clara said. "Who wants to reproduce people like us?"

"I don't understand," I said.

Clara said, "It's a generation problem. Your generation had a high opinion of yourselves. You thought you were wonderful people--brave, strong, honest, law-abiding, productive and God-fearing. Therefore you wanted to reproduce more of the same.

"You assumed that your offspring would be just like you and you wanted to flood the country with little copies of yourself.

"Well, it didn't work out that way," Clara concluded. "You produced an entirely different breed and we've decided we don't want any more like us because we can't stand each other."

"Why should we make babies who are as unhappy and miserable as we are?" Mary Jane asked.

"I don't want any kids like Harry," Fern said.

"But," Harry protested, "you're my girlfriend."

"I don't mind you as my boyfriend," Fern said, "but I couldn't stand you as my son."

"It's true. I could never think of raising a Claude or a Fred. I wouldn't have the stomach for it."

"That isn't a nice thing to say," Fred said defensively.

"Well," Clara replied, "Would you like to be the father of Fern or Mary Jane or Harry or Claude?"

"I wouldn't even want to be the father of me," Fred said.

"If I understand you," I said, "the reason why you don't want to have babies is that you're afraid they'll all turn out like you."

"You got it, Pops," Fern said. "We know what we've done to our parents, and we're not about to let our kids do that to us."

Clara said, "I couldn't hassle with my kids the way I hassle with my mother. I'd go up the wall."

"But," I protested, "if all of you feel that way, the American people--the greatest, most magnificent and wondrous people the world has ever seen--could go down the drain."

"It's not our fault," Mary Jane said. "We're physically but not mentally equipped for it."

Fern said, "Once the country gets down to zero population growth, I might reconsider the whole proposition. But at the moment, I'd rather take the money it costs to raise a child and go to Europe."

"Even buying a Honda motorcycle," Harry said, "would be more fun than having a kid like me."

Letters To The Editor

Amazed and Amazed

To the Editor:

I was amazed and somewhat amused by the gross inaccuracies in the alleged statements of Judy Gill and/or your reporter in your February 18, 1972 issue.

The first assertion, that the reasons for the differences in each caucus (McGovern, Muskie) were because the system of delegate selection was "unprecedented", is another pro-Muskie cop-out similar to Muskie's recent stand on amnesty for draft resisters. Last year the Democratic National committee set forth a brochure on the procedures for the delegate selection in each of the 50 states.

Senator Thomas Eagleton (D-Mo.), who is favorable to Muskie, averred, in the Democratic reply to Nixon's State of the Union speech on nationwide T.V., that these brochures were availabe to all. This material could be and can be obtained from the Democratic National Committee. Certainly if Judy Gill didn't know about this, Ed McColgan and the rest of his leadership coterie did. I will quote the appropriate section:

KNOW THE RULES

Bar automatic delegates ...no part of the process may begin before January 1, 1972. Adequate public notice of the meetings must be given...maximum of 10% selection by any committee...

Ed McColgan's Muskie slate was 100% selected by a still unnamed committee, as were the other slates except the McGovern group, which was elected. Why did only the McGovern slate follow all the rules in the First Congressional District?--Maybe they believe in reform.

On the question of a one-issue candidate--Senator George McGovern is the only candidate who has issued complete position papers on every major issue, and he will issue papers on all issues before long.

Judy--Please read Time magazine, February 14, 1972, page 14 or A.D.A.'s World, page 1 of the February issue.

From Time: "McGovern is undoubtedly ahead among the current Democratic contenders in the thoroughness with which he has worked out his positions."

We all know Muskie was very, very late on the War issue. McGovern doesn't have this credibility gap to overcome.

International Living

To the Editor:

Questionnaires will be distributed to the campus population this week to ascertain different interests which might be incorporated into an International House. The center is to open in the Spring of 1973 in Hamlin House. For the staff of the International Programs Office and several of the committee members, this represents the culmination of a three year search for suitable facilities.

As now proposed, Hamlin would be a conglomeration of language corridors, cultural and academic interest groups, cultural exchange organizations and campus agencies dealing with the effective development of cross-cultural exchange between American and foreign students. The center would serve a varied constituency. To language specialists on campus it will offer the atmosphere, facilities and direction necessary for the development of their language groups. To the campus population, native and foreign, it will offer the programs and facilities for effective cultural interchange.

The International House committee is now seeking more information in order to determine the final composition of the center. Student participation on the committee as well as student interests are being sought. Any student wishing to help plan this new and exciting venture in international living is asked to contact the International Program Office, Rm. 239 Whitmore, Tel. 549-0019. Questionnaires will also be availabe there to the campus population.

Letters

As in previous years the MDC will continue to print letters to the editor. The only requirements are that they be typed at sixty spaces, double-spaced and absolutely no longer than two pages in length. All letters must be signed and the author's address and telephone numbers must be included. No letter will be published without this information. Also, no letters will be printed without the name of the author. Please note this change in policy.

All letters are subject to editing either for content or space according to the judgment of the editors. Also, due to space limitations, we do not guarantee that all letters will be printed.

To the Editor:

Yesterday's Collegian reported that I told the Student Senate that the Board of Trustees has "deliberately" met in a small room in order to limit attendance. To correct the record, I did not say whether their decision was intentional or not, since I cannot read the mind of Dr. Wood

Ode To UMass

To the Editor:

As a foreign student in the Graduate School here at UMass, my impressions are condensed in this song (remembering Romans 12:12 - "Rejoice in your hope, be patient in tribulation, and constant in prayer").

Ode to UMASS

O Father, fortunate am I in my friends and my family,
My hope, my land, my love and my country, O Father.
O Father, let me now forget those who have not as much as I, and in my happiness let me never, never forget them.

There are those who have no home,
No place to call their own,
No land where they can stay and rest.
There are those in misery,
To whom life is full of fear,
To whom hope seems a thing of the past.

Everywhere in the milling crowds,
As nations meet on common ground,
And towers of steel and concrete have no end.
Everyone is a number now,
Yet a smile is a blessing somehow,
That the basic goodness of man is not an end.

Winding ribbons that lead no place,
Teaching classes that go nowhere,
Where in here can I find my way?
In the waters, and in the air,
There is talk, only talk all there,
Just a run to live another day.

Yet in here I rejoice in Hope,
Am patient in tribulation,
And constantly I find a helping hand.
Even here there are a few who care,
Care enough to make my day,
And with them, I glory, in your land.

Help Save Alaska

To the Editor:

The Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act of 1971, passed last December, placed a statutory freeze on Alaskan public lands only until March 17, 1972. And it granted the Secretary of the interior full power to continue their protection thereafter. One man alone--our Secretary of the Interior, the Honorable Rogers C. B. Morton--can make decisions now to save these lands. The opportunists and private interests are ready to participate in a giant land grab. These lands are the most beautiful, sensitive, unspoiled lands remaining on our earth.

Much of Alaska is so fragile that it can break if it is touched. So delicate is the tundra ecosystem at the top of our world that a tractor tread made today is an ugly scar in five years time; a deep eroding ditch a hundred years from now. So vulnerable is its balance of life that even the smallest disturbance can be tantamount to ruin. There are millions of caribou, mountain sheep, moose, ducks, geese, deer and salmon. But wolves, polar bear, falcons and other threatened species can survive only in this, a last remaining habitat. A third of all North America's water fowl come to Alaska to rest and nest and feed. This land is their land And it's our land. Not the oil company's , or the miners' or the developers'. If the oil wells are drilled, the land stripped, the forest leveled, the asphalt poured--this wondrous land and much of the beautiful life within could well perish in our time.

Rogers C. B. Morton has to act before March 18 to protect 50 million acres of public lands from exploitation and to preserve 80 million acres for the establishment of National Parks, Wildlife Refuges, and Scenic and Wild Rivers. The Coalition for Environmental Quality urges you to write to The Honorable Rogers C. B. Morton, Secretary of the Interior, Interior Building, Washington, D.C. 20240, telling him you want these lands preserved. If you don't have time to write a letter, send a postcard, or the coupon CEQ will have in the paper Wednesday and Thursday; or sign the petition we will have at tables on the Concourse Wednesday and Thursday. Help save Alaska.

And Public Service

To the Editor:

I don't suppose that anyone at the Amherst campus of the University of Massachusetts would contradict a statement criticizing the food served at any one of the dining commons. I don't think anyone would say, that given a choice between a dinner cooked by his mother and one by the dining commons, he would prefer the one cooked by the dining commons.

But compare our predicament with the situation the 'students' of a Massachusetts' state school for the mentally retarded must endure. I would rather wait in line to be served in one of the dining commons than be called inside to the basement of a dilapidated building. I would rather stand in line, able to chat with my friends, than to sit on a hard wooden bench amusing myself with visions of the outdoors and fresh air or having no visions at all. I would rather have the two choices offered by the dining commons (including the fluorescent roast beef) than be confronted day after day with the same starchy paste with a few non-descriptive bits of meat which would probably not reach the standards required of a cheap dog food. I would rather be given the choice to sit with my companions and eat at my leisure than to be told with whom I eat and where I eat. I would rather be able to have the right to leave the table than to be forced to sit without a word of protest until told to go back to sitting on the wooden bench in the basement. I would rather eat at Berkshire, Hampshire, Hampden, Franklin or Worcester than to eat in any of the buildings on any of the grounds of the state schools for the mentally retarded.

One could possibly rationalize the gross difference between the two state institutions by commenting that the students of a state university also pay tuition, board and room each semester. But I would answer that the students of the state schools for the mentally retarded have been paying for over a 100 years. When are they going to receive some service!

We ripped off your motorcycle from the lot near Berkshire Commons. You had not re-registered it, and were letting it rot away in the snow and rain. You were not taking proper care of it, and we had a use for it. However, if you are in need of it, and have plans to use it, we feel that you should have it back. Therefore, we propose this:

If you want the motorcycle back, write a letter to the Collegian stating that, and giving the serial number of the engine. Sign your name and give a telephone number. If you do this, we will contact you at that number and tell you where you can find your bike. If you are not going to use or take care of the bike, please let us keep it, as we have a need for it.

Spock To Run For President

BOSTON (AP) — Famed baby doctor and antiwar critic Dr. Benjamin Spock entered an appeal in federal court Thursday seeking permission to campaign for the presidency at Quonset Point Naval Air Station, R.I.

Spock, the candidate for president on the Peoples' Party Ticket, joined Socialist Workers Party presidential candidates Linda Jenness in an appeal in U.S. District Court in Rhode Island seeking to overturn the base commander's denial of their petition to campaign on the base.

They asked for permission to campaign on the base in a joint letter dated Jan. 19. Capt. R.W. Frame, the base commander, answered them in a letter dated Jan. 27:

"It is the policy of the Department of Defense to avoid conduct that either directly or indirectly endorses or selectively benefits or favor any political group, or is associated with the solicitation of votes in a political election."

In a news conference here Spock denounced the denial, saying, "The election laws are being used not to help the people, they are being used to keep any parties but the Democrats and Republicans off the ballot."

Spock said the Peoples' Party is a coalition of local independent parties put together last summer in meetings in Albuquerque, N.M., and Dallas. He listed examples as the Independent Party of New Mexico, the Peace and Freedom Party in California and the New Party, which exists in several states, including Florida.

He said the California party has cornered as much as 11 per cent of the vote in local elections and as much as 3 per cent in statewide elections. The New Mexico party ran a slate in the 1970 general election, including a candidate for governor.

Spock and Miss Jenness claim that because of their minority party status, they do not have funds to mount expensive campaigns in broadcast or print media, and that by denying them access to a segment of the voting population, the Department of Defense is denying them their rights under the first and fifth amendments to the U.S. Constiution.

Secretary of Defense Melvin Laird and Frame are the defendants in the action.

Spock said his party has raised about $10,000 in contributions toward his presidential campaign, and that last year he has spent about $8,000 of his own money in the campaign.

He said he has campaigned in California, Utah, New Hampshire, Maine and Kentucky.

He also denounced the Massachusetts requirement that his party obtain 56,000 qualified signatures to get on the ballot here, saying that for a minority party he felt that was an excessive number.

Spock also renewed his campaing against the Vietnam war, saying, "I think nuclear war is going to destroy the whole world if we don't disarm."

He said, "The President has spoken of 'honor' in the Vietnam context. He may think that honor lies in using at least tactical nuclear weapons in Vietnam."

Spock said he feared that attacks by the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese during the withdrawal of American troops might prompt the use of nuclear weapons by the U.S. to prevent a defeat.

Sarge: Economy Vs. Ecology

WASHINGTON (AP) — Gov. Francis W. Sargent of Massachusetts today called for a "balancing" of the legitimate demands of business and the environmentalists.

In a speech prepared for delivery before a plenary session of the National Governors' Conference winter meeting, Sargent said "environmental concern must go hand-in-hand with economic development if we are to achieve more than token protection."

Sargent proposed four principles "to guide any governor who is dedicated to the achievement of balanced society-- a society that provides for goods and services while it maintains a quality environment."

The Massachusetts Republican said the "ecological approach" should be adopted as "the fundamental premise for all public decision making."

He said "we must build an expanding set of human values. No growth comes from replacing one set of values with another."

Sargent also said a higher priority should be placed on long-term values than on short-term gains, and he called for public participation in governmental decision making.

Cancer In Women

Question: What types of cancer do women get?
Answer: Women can develop many types of cancer, but the twoleading types are uterine cancer and breast cancer.

Question: Are these types of cancer curable?
Answer: If they are detected and treated early, uterine and breast cancer are highly curable.

Question: How are they detected?
Answer: You doctor includes tests for them in your annual physical checkup. In addition, each woman should do a Breast Self-examination regularly.

Question: What test is done for cancer of the uterus?
Answer: The PAP test. This is a simple, painless, and unbelievably important test. It was named after the man who developed it, Dr. George Papanicolaou.

Question: What does the test involve?
Answer: Your physician takes a sample of cervical cells and smears them on a glass slide. He then sends them to a cytology lab, where a specially trained pathologist examines the cells under a microscope. He can detect abnormalities in the cells months or years before actual symptoms would have occurred. If the tests how that a woman does have uterine cancer, early treatment could make it almost 100% curable. (30 years ago, it was the leading cause of cancer death among women.)

Question: How is breast cancer detected?
Answer: 95% of all breast cancers are discovered by women themselves. That's why Breast Self-examination is so important. Your doctor will show you how to do this at your physical checkup, and then you should make it part of a regular monthly routine. Most masses felt in the breast are NOT cancer. But if one is cancerous, and it's treated properly, it is also highly curable.

Therefore, a regular health checkup is a must for every woman. And, in between them, Breast Self-examination should be practiced every month. Thousands of women die needlessly every year, when a few minutes of their time could have saved their lives.

All questions should be directed to the UMass Health Services.

Due to the increased number of applications being processed for the fall semester, staff limitations, and the extra burden imposed by a quota system, the Graduate School has found it necessary to close the Graduate Admissions Office one day a week. Effective February 25 the Graduate Admissions Office will be closed for business on all Fridays through April 14. Telephone inquiries and requests for admissions materials will be handled on those days by the receptionist in the second floor lobby of the Graduate Research Center.

Jews To Celebrate Purim

By GEOFFREY LEVINE

On Monday, February 28th, the Jewish people will celebrate the holiday Purim. Jews around the world will be reading from the Megillah which recounts the story of the Jews' escape from a power mad official in the court of King Ahasuerus in the city of Shushan.

According to tradition, there are four "mitzvots" or good deeds that are required on Purim. The first is the reading of the Purim story, the second is the giving of presents to friends, the third is the giving of gifts to charity, and the fourth is to get rip-roaring drunk.

The purpose of the wine on Purim is to obstruct the participant's vision to the point where he can no longer tell the difference between the holy man Mordecai and the power made Haman. It is interesting to note that G-d is not mentioned once in the book. The ancient rabbis tell us that this is to teach that the Lord, blessed be His Name, acts miraculously through the natural.

On Monday night, February 28th, at 7:30 p.m. in Room 420 of the Student Union, Purim will be celebrated according to the mystical practices developed over the four thousand year history of the Jewish people.

On Tuesday night, in keeping with the humorous spirit of Purim, a debate will be offered between Professors Arthur Elkins, Joe Marcus, and Lucien Miller. The topic of the debate is: "resolved: That the custom of giving raw food gifts on Purim had more significance than the custom of giving cooked food gifts." This event will also be in Room 420 SU.

Come enjoy Purim with us. Learn with us. Look in the mirror and laugh with us.

Beer Banned At Schaeffer

BOSTON (AP) — Police and officials of Schaeffer Stadium have urged that a ban on beer brought from home be continued at the Foxboro home of the New England Patriots of the National Football League.

Philip Fine, a trustee of the stadium, told the joint legislative Committee on Government Regulations Wednesday that drunken football fans are getting that way on beer brought into the stadium illegally.

He said officials know how much beer is sold and the problem of drunkenness results from beer snuck in.

When it was discovered that people were bringing the beverage to the stadium in home coolers, the coolers were banned, Fine said. "Now they're bringing it in in their pockets."

Fine testified against a bill filed by Rep. Donald T. Bliss, R-Attleboro, to allow fans to bring a six-pack of beer into the stadium.

Foxboro Police Chief Daniel W. McCarthy told the committee that one of the greatest problems concerning the stadium has been drunks, which, he says, the town does not have facilities to handle.

After the Patriots-Miami Dolphins game last season, seven people were locked up for being intoxicated.

"It's worse if they win the game," he said.

No one appeared to support the bill.

Mass Spanish Face Race Discrimination

BOSTON (AP)-A report released Thursday to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights says Massachusetts Spanish-speaking residents are victims of discrimination in jobs, housing, schooling and health care.

The 104-page report by the Massachusetts State Advisory Committee to the commission asserts the state's 24 federally-funded antipoverty agencies aim chiefly to aid black residents.

The report says the language barrier is the chief bar keeping Puerto Ricans from a better life, and makes 66 recommendations to ease the problem.

The include:
—Increased state hiring of Spanish-speaking employes.
—A state census of Spanish-speaking public school pupils.
—Increased help for the Spanish-speaking by antipoverty groups.
—A federal probe of hospital hiring practices.

"If state and local governments are deficient in employing the Spanish-speaking and Puerto Rican," the report says, "a lion's share of the blame must rest with the Civil Service Commission," since public agencies hire from civil service lists.

The report says Puerto Ricans get chiefly low pay, unskilled jobs, and "if the Puerto Rican remains in school, he is destined to an education which will prepare him only for a 'nonprofessional' job."

The Committee also asserts Boston school officials do not know how many Spanish-speaking youngsters are not enrolled, and says Boston and Springfield school systems need much better bilingual courses and teaching for pupils to whom English is a second language.

The report estimates the number of Spanish-speaking Bay State residents at 50,000 to 100,000 including up to 50,000 in Boston and 15,000 in Springfield.

The report by the 27-member committee followed hearings last May 11-13.

Kuentz Orch. At Bowker

The Paul Kuentz Chamber Orchestra of Paris, an ensemble of fourteen prize-winning instrumentalists, will appear at Bowker Auditorium on the UMass Campus on Monday and Tuesday, February 28 and 29 at 8:00 p.m. as the fourth event of the Celebrity Series sponsored by the UMass Fine Arts Council.

The Orchestra's Amherst programs will include works by Mozart, Vivaldi, Bach, Handel, Scarletti, Telemann and other 17th to 20th century composers. Joining the current North American tour is the distinguished French trumpet virtuoso, Jean-Francois Dion and soprano soloist Barbara Schlick.

Reserved tickets for the evening performances are available in the Fine Arts Council Office, 125 Herter Hall, Telephone 545-0202.

Engineers' Week Begins

The UMass School of Engineering will present Engineers' Week Convocation Thursday, Feb. 24 at 4 p.m. in the Engineering Building East Auditorium.

Dr. Gordon S. Brown, Dugald C. Jackson Professor of Engineering at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, will speak on "Engineers--Makers of Hardware and Software for Society."

Author of 50-odd technical papers on automatic control, articles on engineering education, and other, Dr. Brown received the President's Certificate of Merit in 1948, and holds honorary doctor of science and engineering degrees from Purdue and Dartmouth Universities, the Technical University of Denmark, Southern Methodist University, and Stevens Institute of Technology.

He is a Royal Melbourne (Australia) Technical School graduate and a former MIT dean of engineering. He received his bachelor, master and Ph.D. degrees from MIT.

Dr. Brown is the founder and former director of Servomechanisms Laboratory at MIT, vice chairman of the Massachusetts Science and Technology Foundation, and director or former director of eight corporations and industries, including United Carr and Gillette. He is a former member of the President's Committee on the National Medal of Science and a member of the National Academy of Engineering.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

☆ By SYDNEY OMARR ☆

Betty, from Santa Monica, Calif., writes to complain that this column has been unfair to Scorpio. "I was born under that sign," she says. "But after what you have written, my boyfriend threatens to break off our relationship. Can you make amends?" All right, Betty. Here goes. Scorpio women are glamorous, secretive, sexy and love to spend money. These women can be flirtatious, jealous and, at times, complain about nothing. I hope, Betty, that this will set your boyfriend straight.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Steer clear of legal complications. Question of property ownership could arise. Old agreements may be broken. Trust your own hunch. Taking word of too many people now can be risky and costly.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Surprise due in area assocated with employment, basic needs. Stress alternatives. Be flexible. Don't be in too much of a hurry. Give ideas time to develop. Mature approach now is a requisite. Act accordingly.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): What you desire may be at a distance. There will be quick changes. Don't waste money. Size up situation. Take inventory. If observant, you find what is needed. Be aware of details. Thorough approach is necessary.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Family member deserves change of scenery. Accent is on building a more solid relationship. Communicate. Express feelings. Don't permit home area to become battleground. Review property rights.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Ideas are plentiful. Key now is to be selective. Relative or neighbor will co-operate. But you must give in order to receive. Message will become increasingly clear. Obtain valid hint from Cancer message.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Protect valuables. Some persons now covet what you possess. See situation in realistic light. Don't take unnecessary risks with capital. Friend with unorthodox idea can aid in solving dilemma.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You get chance to capitalize on unusual situation. Halfway measures will not suffice. Know this; act accordingly. Accent is on presenting new format. In personal life be ready for sudden changes.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You gain access to confidential material. Use it intelligently. Make future plans involving travel, writing, publishing. Best now to complete projects rather than to start something new. You will understand.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Strive to make your own imprint. Following others now would not be beneficial. Unusual alliances are formed. Don't fear the unorthodox. Be willing experiment. If inventive, definite gain results.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You are given choice. Two offers occur simultaneously. Key is to be receptive. Avoid display of temperament. Questions concerning marriage are paramount. Cancer individual plays prominent role.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You can take solid steps toward making a bright future. Open new horizons. There are no real limitations except those which are self-imposed. Accept social invitation. It could lead to important contact.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): You face test. It is not as difficult as might first be imagined. Key is to do first things first. This includes keeping promises to loved ones, including children. Get some investment counseling.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are introspective, serious. Few persons know the real you-the one who is spiritual, sensitive to plight of underdog. This year will find you tackling new projects, becoming more independent- and happier. July could be most significant month of 1972.

Forwards On The March

By MARK VOGLER

In two weeks or so, it will all be over. No more practice sessions to attend, no more basketball games to play in. The agony of defeat and the sweetness of triumph will have ended.

For senior forwards Chris Coffin and Rich Vogeley, only the jubulious memories of two NIT berths, a New England basketball championship, and the honorable distinction of having played along side the incomparable Julius Erving will linger on. The if's will be left to ponder upon in close, but dejecting defeats that were determined at the buzzer to such teams as Providence, Harvard, Fordham, and Boston College.

Their years on the UMass basketball team were marked by success for the most part. From the school's best freshman hoop squad ever assembled (15-0), they helped continue the winning tradition on the varsity with consecutive years that may never be reproduced (18-7, 23-4).

But it wasn't all roses for Coffin and Vogeley. There were times in their careers filled with hard luck and disappointment, and the breaks just seemed to go against them. Coffin's plight was a financial one. Coming from an area where the brand of basketball was not too fine, limited his chances of attaining a scholarship. For three years he was actually a fringe benefit to the squad in that he might put in as much playing time as a player on scholarship while he had no such aid.

Coffin, however, was receiving partial financial aid. After landing down a starting position last winter, he was rewarded a complete scholarship for his final year. But the fact remains that the task of proving himself prior to the scholarship was a tough one.

Vogeley, in contrast to Coffin, didn't have to prove himself right in from the start. During his freshman year he ranked close to Erving as a sharpshooter. His single game frosh record of 36 points against Rockwood Academy still stands. But the highly heralded hoopster seemed to have reached his peak before he ever entered the varsity ranks. Coach Jack Leaman could best point out the misfortunes that befell him.

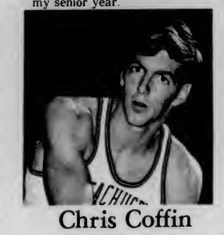
"It has been unfortunate that Rich has been hampered in two previous seasons by pesky illnesses that have limited his opportunities. He has possessed the tools to have become an outstanding basketball player, but unfortunately he has never had the physical well being to go at it.

"This year he has been healthy. He's an outstanding player and the kind who seems to have the knack of coming off the bench and doing a very fine job."



This being his final year of ball and being in the finest health he's ever been in, Vogeley can't be at all too pleased with the way things have gone for him. He's not even considered a starter. When asked whether he was satisfied with his basketball life at UMass, his response was frank.

"As a team player, yes. As an individual, no. I don't think I ever reached the potential I could have. Looking back in all honesty, I do believe that I was given an equal opportunity. I feel that whoever was assigned to play should have played.

"It seems now that I just lost interest in the game. After my freshman year it didn't mean much to me anymore. Maybe I should have given someone else a chance to play, but I've never been a quitter. What kept me going was mainly the satisfaction of seeing something through."

Coffin credits former Redman freshman coach Peter Broaca with giving him some personal incentive to climb his own hurdles to his present stature.

"Coach Broaca really got me off on the whole thing, remarked Coffin. "He sort of prepared and told me what I had to do to play college basketball on the varsity level. He understood my situation and gave me confidence and desire to go on and play. He thought that I had the ability to play and I proved myself by acquiring a full scholarship in my senior year.

Chris Coffin

"Having played in high school against a low caliber of ball, I had really no aspiration of playing at college. And then to have come this far has really been a personal accomplishment for me."

Coach Leaman has high words of praise for Coffin's defensive ability. "Chris is probably the most under rated basketball player to ever play at UMass. He's by far the finest defensive forward in New England and always plays the best men of our opponents.

"Chris has the ability but lacks the confidence to be a complete ball player. But we would not be where we are today without the work of Chris Coffin on defense. When you talk about team players, people who give their all for the team and forget team glory, you talk about Chris Coffin".

When asked to select the five best players that he has ever played man-on-man against, Coffin chose Fordam's Ken Charles, P.C.'s Jim Larranagua, UConn's Bob Staak, Villanova's Chris Ford, and Harvard's James Brown. Coffin says that he plays them all the same way.

For the aggressive and scrappy type of hustler's game that Coffin plays, he's constantly in foul trouble. He's undoubtably fouled out more in the past two years than anybody on the squad.

"The way I feel about it," says Coffin, "is that if I lay off a kid, I shouldn't be in the game. As long as I'm in there I do my thing and I do it the best way I know how.

"The only time it bothers me when I foul out is if we lost by two or three points. Then I feel I could have done something and still been in the game."

While at high school Vogeley had the opportunity to play against Julius Erving, his team managed to win one game out of three.

Gymnasts Edged

By STEVE CARY

Wednesday, in the cold fieldhouse at Springfield College, the UMass women gymnasts sustained their first loss of the season to the National Champions 106.40 to 101.00. Springfield presumably used their strongest lineup which consists of no all around performers, lessening the competitive load for each girl, and clearly dominated the evening's event. UMass' five member team with its three all around people scored competitively on all the events excepting Balance Beam.

In the past two meets UMass has experienced difficulty completing beam routines under the pressure of competition. Wednesday they lost nearly four points in this event, which put an otherwise close meet out of their control. Co-captain Margie Combs led the UMass effort with a 34.65 all around score, and gained much support with a surprise 33.05 all around total from injured Jeannine Burger.

Springfield tumbled strongly to win the Floor Exercise, accumulating 26.95 to a Mass 26.50. Their Kathy Kolemainen won the event with a 9.1, Margie Combs took second at 9.05, and Debbie Dunkley was third with an 8.95. The scoring always seemed to leave the UMass girls behind Springfield by any where from only five hundreths to two tenths of a point. Perhaps our screaming group of supporters just didn't have enough volume to affect the judges.

On Side Horse Vaulting it went the same way, with Margie finding herself five hundreths of a point behind to take second again. Kathey Kolemainen won at 9.2, and Margie got the 9.15. Third was a happy Jeannine Burger with a 9.0. The Beam was swept by Springfield with Judi Markell first - 8.85, Kate Raffery second-8.8, and a tie between Lucy Miller and Debbie Dunkley-8.35. The Uneven Bars went to Springfield by .35, as they displayed about that much more amplitude, with Miss Dunkley high scorer of the meet at 9.3, Margie Combs close for second a third time at 9.15, and Patti Corrigan third rating 8.85.

These scores were high as I was told by a non-participating professional judge, but they were consistent enough to dispel any doubt of the outcome. The constant tenth of a point or so that Springfield enjoyed all evening could have easily fallen under the judge's safeguard, general impression, which determines one of the possible ten points per routine.

Women Swimmers Triumph

By JANIS AHMADJIAN

"We Won!" "Doesn't it feel Great!" The first win of the season is always a big moment for an athletic team and the U. Mass Women's Swim Team is certainly no exception. The long hard weeks of practice finally paid off as the swimmers downed U.R.I. 60/51 last Wednesday afternoon in a tense, extremely close meet. Team confidence and a strong will to win pulled U. Mass through the tight spots of the meet held at U.R.I.'s new 3-pool complex.

It was nip and tuck for U.Mass in the beginning. The 200 yard Medley Relay team consisting of Sue White, Bridgett Adams, Mary Beth Stanne, and Roxanne LaCoste was defeated.

Jan Reid, Janis Ahmadjian, and Roxanne LaCoste swam for U.Mass. in the fast 50 yd. Freestyle. Jan Reid placed first with a time of 29.9 seconds.

Int the third event the 200 yard Freestyle, Claire Briana pulled a second.

In the third event the 200 yeard Freestyle, Claire Briana pulled a second.

Swimming for U.Mass. in the 50 yd. Backstroke wer Sue White and Laurie Seluk who placed first, time 34.7.

In the 50 yard Breaststroke Mary Beth Stanne gained a first place, while Bridgeet Adams nabbed a third.

The next event, 50 yard Butterfly, Laurie Seluk grabbed a first with a time of 32.1 seconds and Jan Reid a second pulling UMass into the lead 27/24.

Sue White performed some excellent dives in the one meter Diving Competition. She outclassed the U.R.I. divers in style, poise, and performance. However, due to a misunderstanding on one of her dives she received only third place.

After the dining a strong "give them all you've got" attitude prevailed, and that is exactly what we did.

In the 100 yard Individual Medley Laurie Seluk placed first with a time of 1:38.8 and Mary Beth Stanne a second. U. Mass. in the lead 36/33.

Claire Braina and Jan Reid swam the 100 yard Freestyle for U.Mass. Jan Reid grabbed a first, time 1:75.

Next event, the 100 yard Backstroke-Roxanne LaCoste won a second place with Karen Bornheim also swinning.

U.Mass. was in the lead by just one pont 44/43 at the start of the 100 yard Breaststroke. Claire Briana won a first place and Bridgett Adams a third.

Tension really built up during the grueling 100 yard Butterfly. Mary Beth Stanne gained a second place.

However, this was not enough to pull U. Mass. out of danger. We were ahead 53/51 but everything depended on the last event, the 200 yard Freestyle Relay.

UNH Reverses The Script

Senior Night Saturday

By EARLE BARROLL

Durham, N.H.-If youre not a devout believer in the home court advantage you should have been here last night as New Hampshire gave UMass some of its own medicine in pulling off a 61-56 upset that dashed any hopes of an NIT bid for the Redmen this season.

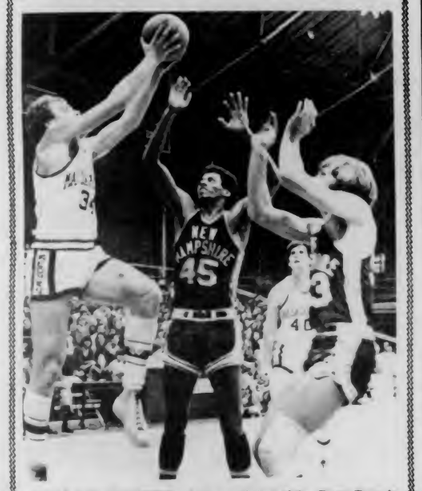
Head Coach Jack Leaman summed it up best when he said, "We were atrocious." And if you can find any other synonyms that are comparable to Leaman's description then use 'em...they fit the atmosphere that prevailed here last night.

The beginning of the end started midway into the first half when UNH broke a 13-13 deadlock (the fourth tie to this point) with a five-point surge that mounted continuously in the remaining minutes of the first half and UMass found itself down by a dozen at the half to an inspired, well coached and well disciplined Wildcat basketball team.

To call this first half a nightmare is an understatement. It was more, a display of ineptitude that UMass basketball has not been accustomed to during the past couple of weeks. The chief architect of the UMass demise during this opening segment were a little pesty guard by the name of Erie Feragne and forward Dave Pemberton who was not the same Pemberton who played at Amherst in the first meeting between these two ball clubs.

Between the two of them they scored twenty-one out of their team's thirty-one first half points and combined with the supporting efforts of their teammates the Wildcats hit a red hot 63% from the field as compared to 39% for the Redmen.

If the first half wasn't enough of a nightmare the second half just aggravated the situation even more as Feragne and Pemberton burst quickly from the blocks with an explosive shooting performance that turned the game into an out and out rout at 40-22 with about fifteen minutes left to play.



At this point, the momentum changed to the UMass side, as seven quick points brought the lead down to eleven, where it fluctuated for the next ten minutes until Pemberton fouled out with four minutes to go...the remainder of the game was "a ballgame." Al Skinner hit for seven points, Tom Austin added a bucket, and suddenly UMass was down by two just a minute later. UNH was not to be denied as it fought off the Redmen point for point and it was only when UMass was forced to foul in the last minute that the Wildcats were able to ice the game.

The UMass record in the conference now stands at 5-2. Once again Rhode Island is let off the hook, Maine is back in the ballgame and all three have two losses each, and in the next two games the conference should be decided.

Maine is at the Cage tomorrow night, and the Redmen travel to Rhody on Tuesday night.

Scoring Summary

UMass	FG	FT	PTS	UNH	FG	FT	PTS
Betancourt	7		14	Feragne	6	6	18
Pagliara	1	1	3	Peters	1	1	3
Coffin	1		2	Cormier	4		8
Skinner	5	5	15	Minkwitz	2	5	9
Trow	5		10	Pemberton	9	5	23
McLaughlin	2		4
Austin	3	2	8

WHAT DIDN'T HAPPEN often enough last night. Peter Trow is shown scoring over two UNH players. In background is Tom McGlaughlin awaiting a possible rebound. Trow and McGlaughlin along with Al Skinner and Tom Austin will be returning next year to lead the varsity squad but some of the players won't be seen in a UMass uniform after this Saturday night. The game against UMaine at the Cage will be the farewell to seniors John Betancourt, Chris Coffin, Rich Vogeley, and Mike Pagliara.

Grapplers Go For Two

By JOHN BOCK

"It should be a great tournament."

These are the words that head Coach Homer Barr used to describe the 26th Annual New England Intercollegiate Wrestling Association Tournament to be held at Central Connecticut State College in New Britain today and tomorrow. The tourney is the highlight and finale of New England college wrestling and always brings some surprises with it.

Take last year, for instance. That is when the UMass Redmen wrestled the NEIWA Crown away from Springfield College, 20 year King of New England Wrestling. Definitely not the favored team, Barr's boys took three firsts and many of the consolation places to outpoint SC and gain fame and fortune.

There are some not so remarkable similarities going into this year's tourney. The Chiefs are once again the on-paper favorites by virtue of the fact that they have copped four of the ten top seeds. Top seeded for SC are Bob Meyer at 118, Buddy Fenton at 126, defending Champ Steve Gaydosh at 158, and John Porillo at 167. The rest of the Chiefs come in at least in the top five seeds.

Another similarity is that the balance of the team is better than the Redmen, but perhaps not as good as URI, another tourney favorite.

Just how did the Redmen fare when the seeding committee met on Wednesday and made their pick of the best in the NEIWA?

UMass was not disappointed as both defending NEIWA Champs received top seeds. Senior Captain Shelly Goldberg, last year's Champ at 134, is looking for his third New England title. Junior Carl Dambman, surprise heavyweight winner in '71, returns to defend his crown after a seesaw season at 190-heavyweight. Both Goldberg and Dambman are the favorites of the tournament. Shelly complains that the referees are not amongst his more devoted fans, and that they may give him a lot of trouble with his style of wrestling.

Second seeds for the Redmen include Dave Amato at 118 and Bruce Buckbee at 190. Amato, last year's NEIWA runner-up at 118 and this year, would like to win all the marbles this time around. It looks to be Amato and Meyer in the finals and the winner should depend on takedown ability. Bruce Buckbee moves up to 190 after wrestling steadily at 177 this season, because it is there that he appears to be able to wrestle his kind of match; a defensive first period and emphasis on riding. His top seeded opponent is over-the-hill neighbor Gary Sklaver from Amherst. Sklaver seeks his fourth New England Championship this year and is heavily favored to get it. The final at this weight class should be Sklaver-Buckbee.

In the third seeded category is senior 142 pounder Clay Jester. Clay has shown remarkable progress in the last weeks of practice and is using his uncanny strength to the best advantage. Top seed in this weight class went to Rod Tater of Central Connecticut, with second seed honors going to Charles Catania of URI. Catania was the pre-tourney choice but was bested by Tater in a recent URI-CCSC dual meet. The other third seed UMass is blessed with comes in the form of Russ Chateauneuf. Russ has one of the highest seeds of any fresh wrestling in the varsity level and certainly has demonstrated his capability this season. It has been a long battle for Russ to drop his weight to 134, but he has made it and shows good promise. The number one seed went to Joe Savino of URI , who recently pulled out a decision in the last thirty seconds from Mike McGlaughlin, then wrestling 134 for the Redmen.

Rounding out the seeds for the UMass varsity are freshmen Mike McGlaughlin sixth at 126, Chris Cadwallader sixth at 158, and John Connolly eighth at 177. Sophomore Mike Duffy received the sixth seed position at 167, probably due to the fact that he has only wrestled since the beginning of the second semester and he could be a good bet to pull one of the upsets that UMass needs.

A surprise seed is Charles Estim, sophomore whiz from Dartmouth, who has apparently beaten last year's 177-pound Champ Ted Thompson, and he was awarded the top position at that weight.

One of the things that makes the NEIWA unique among the many conferences in the nation is the fact that it holds a tournament to decide the best freshmen in the New England area. It is held at the same time that the varsity is held and has the same number of matches (quarter, semi, and consolation rounds). The only top seed for the UMass frosh is Steve Rome, the Hercules of Springfield Classical. Steve was undefeated as a Freshman wrestling in the JV matches and did well in those Varsity matches he wrestled in.

Vida's Blue

OAKLAND (AP) — "If I could sit down and talk to Vida Blue, I think I could sign him," said Oakland Athletics' owner Charles O. Finley Thursday.

But Finley and his 22-year-old pitching star were far apart, in more ways than one, when the A's opened their spring training camp in Mesa, Ariz., Thursday.

Blue, baseball's biggest success story of 1971, was home in Mansfield, La., holding out for a lot more than the $50,000 being offered by Finley.

"Vida has requested that all negotiations be handled through his attorney," Finley said, "and I think maybe he the attorney has an axe to grind."

Blue's attorney, Robert J. Gerst of Los Angeles, denies that. He says Blue should get at least $92,000 because "he is at a minimum one of the 10 best pitchers in baseball and should be paid accordingly."

Christ On Campus: Camping The Crusade

By JEFF CLAYTON

"What deviant amongst us will risk eternal damnation to write some splashy copy about a distinct animal called a Jesus Freak" —Bob Nesti, Editor

"I'll do it" —Jeff Clayton, Flunkey.

The first thing to get clear on is that what we have here at UMass is a serious and chronic shortage of J.F.'s. That is, there aren't any. Even maniacs of other descriptions tend to be sort of small-time around here, but as for real, hirsute, Bible-waving NUTS...well, nut-gatherers are just doomed to disappointment that's all. Do you begin to see some of the advantages of the Boston campus? No?

Boston canvasser probably have their problems too. Nuts, like many people quite often feel that their time is better spent someplace other than school, a feeling I share by the way, so if you think you qualify I suggest you put down the paper and get moving. Keep the middle section for the bus. And if you're a real religious nut, and I overlooked you, I apologize. You can leave a firey cross or something else suitable at the Collegian Office on your way out. And I promise I'll look it over first thing Monday Morning.

Those of you who are left, if any, don't feel bad. There are a number a growing number they say, of self-styled Christian fanatics and revolutionaries around, and I talked to a handful of them, and if you'll just follow along you'll see how it went. While some seemed to lack the true revolutionary spark to a degree, they all had their points, some of them in common. They have all reached a point in their lives when they felt something was desperately missing which they called God, they are all thoroughly utterly unwelcome loudly straight. In this article we take straight to mean normal and well balanced, not given to extremes, relatively well-satisfied with life as interpreted by the Average American we all appeal to when explaining straightness - you know, straight. The Overthrow: Part V

It was a fine Monday afternoon. Saturday's "largest snowfall of the year" had blasted a substantial amount of the white stuff onto the campus to make the normally flat landscape roll with billowing dunes. I had smoked a couple of joints with some friends when all of a sudden, my mind like cement, I realized that I had to get to class. I ran out of the building, a copy of The Odyssey under my arm.

My progress was slow as little had been done in the way of snow removal in the last two days. My heart warmed, though, when I passed Whitmore, and there, before my very eyes, was the entire UMass highway maintenance crew working their little tails off to clear the rampway to Whitmore. Then I turned and made my way to the main entrance to Herter.

Ever since the start of my walk to class I had had the nagging fear in the back of my mind that something was wrong. By the time I got to room 205 there was no doubt of it--something was definitely wrong. There was not a soul in the room. In the same moment that I excused this fact another one hit me--I hadn't seen a soul since I left Southwest!

I dropped into a chair with the sudden worry that this was like a scene from The Revolt of The Triffids when I heard footsteps in the hall which announced the entrance of the lumbering carcass of "Big" Chuck Ublinski, a fellow classmate.

"Hey, huh?" he said in a typical eloquent salutation. "Kinda cold, huh? Colda than a witches tit". He guffawed and I almost puked.

It was 2:30 and "Nobody else had arrived. More footsteps sounded and I sat up expectantly. Bursting into the room in her typical bustling style Mrs. Edwards let off with her usual, "Goouud arfter--nooooon!'" (which is English for "good afternoon." "Ah hah," you may say, "there's more than one English accented woman working for Undergraduate English at this illustrious institution." And I'll reply to that: "Yep, that's what makes our English Department so unique." Unlike Erma, however, you can tell that Mrs. Edwards is for real.)

Anyway, without even looking up she immediately got pissed off that no one--as opposed to "Nohbdy"--had made an answer to her greeting. Well, to tell the truth both "Big" Chuck and myself felt like complete assholes sitting there all alone, so we remained silent. She repeated her greeting and I, in my best Texas accent (I figured the contrast would be interesting), answered: "Howdy ma'am." She refused to hear such a vugar tone of voice aimed at her, so she ignored me and, without yet looking up, started her harangue (alias "lecture").

For a full thirty minutes she did not let up. Continually sucking on some variety of lifesaver she went on and on about the "rosy fingers of dawn", the "odyssey of life," and aesthetics and appreciating the "finer things in life". Then she did a favorite thing of hers--she generalized to the most absurd extreme by telling us all how we absolutely "hated" Motzart, Rembrant, et al (for some reason known only to herself --and persons of her peculiarly condescending mentality--it was because we were young that we "hated" those masters). Incredible.

By this time my blood was almost gaseous from boiling. Almost incidentious from rage I hopped up and shouted in my best Oxford accent, "Humbug, ma'am, so much humbug."

Hearing one of her own kind contradict her was enough to make her bright, glazing eyes pop right out of her head. But to have her statements contradicted in her own classroom in such a manner was too much to rebuff. She swooned and was about to topple to the floor when Ublinski, in a voice tremulous with emotion burped out, "Ma'am, I know what ya mean. I hate Motzart and his da da, da, de, da da, dum dum, de de (here he butchered Motzart's Jupiter Symphony), but I loooove Homer."

Revived with these medicinal words she propped herself up and, for the first time, looked across the classroom at Ublinski. With an endearing smile she said in a most proud voice, "Oh, Right On Ublinski, Right On'" With that she slumped back into her chair, out cold. I guess too many revelations at one time was just too much for her.

Snarling at "Big" Chuck I stalked out of the room and into the snow. I was anticipating a meeting on strategy that was to take place with Big Louie and Nick in half an hour. Then I remembered what day it was. I was wrecked before and it was just a beautiful Monday. Now it was really MONDAY! Washington's Birthday.

While chuckling on one hand about how ridiculous the whole situation was, I couldn't help being infuriated more and more as the backward teachings of English 125 continued to manifested themselves. I tramped across the snow more intent on revenge as ever, looking forward to the forthcoming abduction of the head of the English 125 program.

Poet Laureate of the Counter-Culture

Each age has been distinguished with a novelist who somwhow reflected the eluxive spirit of their times. Fitzgerald captured the Twenties, Steinbeck the Depression, Salinger the complacent Fifties, Mailer the Hectic Sixties, and the list seems without end. From some reports the Seventies may be the generation of a young man named Richard Brautigan whose works Trout Fishing In America and The Abortion have received a wide, popular readership. Despite what you may hear about Norman Mailer, H.P. Lovecraft, or Tom Wolfe, this bearded, unassuming looking young man is the "in" novelist of the day. Frank Baglione may just have the reason why on page five.

Can George Do It?

The Democratic party is becoming more and more of a chaotic issue these days as primary elections near at a rapid pace. Reid Fishman has presented a factual resume of George McGovern's accomplishments and personal ambitions that show exactly why he should be elected.

McGovern's attitudes and ideas concerning such things as the draft, drugs, volunteer armies, etc. are taken up as well as plans relating to any campaign procedures.

Can McGovern win? This is the big question. All indications say it may be possible and the reasons lie within. Mr. Fishman describes the participation in student support not only here but throughout the country along with its vital and ever increasing need in New Hampshire.

Defining American Culture

It just isn't any good anymore to believe in rock, revolution, or some magical stairway to success. Whatever our high school dreams, or present life disillusionments, it we don't look and see what life 'out there' is really like, we're going to spend the rest of our lives wondering what the hell happened when we got kicked out the door. We complain that our parents live in the past, and criticize the lives they have made for themselves out of the despair of the two World Wars. But we too are living in the past—in an end-of-the-road hostility or a misty eyed hope toward the future that we have cultivated in our childhood. In Part One of this series Donald Robadue, Jr. dispels some of the myths and fantasies we have been led, and have led ourselves, to believe about the outside.

And rummaging through the bowels of our issue you can continue on page four where you may learn of one of the most interesting and important women of the ceutnry: Anais Nin. Then learn more about the Montague Plains Controversy on page 6. From McGovern and the centerfold move onward to our album reviews. Here Steve Feld dissects the latest by Neil Young, has the dear boy lost his touch? Our own injured lad happens to think so. Kenny Sulin discusses Jim Messina and he too, isn't quite as good as he should be. All on pages 10 and 11. Films this week highlight an lengthy analysis of Dirty Harry by Patrick Sullivan which states there are more inherent dangers to the film than meet the eye, and Mary Lou Gordon explains why Johnny Got His Gun is a stirring film achievement. Bafflin' Frank Johnson discusses speakers on page 14, a new puzzle appears on 15, Weekend on 16, and on our left the latest installment in our attempt to make a celebrity out of Erma Forader and get her out of Bartlett 252 and onto the Cavett Show.

a group be inclined to run fatalistic and possible fatal experiments with dope, sex, booze, crime and any of your favorite pastimes. They would be concerned about the future of natural things in the world today (that's ecology, right? Oh, ecology!) They would not do anything direct about the situation any more than you would. They do not kick the pinball machine even when sorely provoked. In fact, when sorely provoked, they don't get sorely provoked.

Two of these four common symptoms (guess which two) are directly attributable to the fact that these people sincerely try to "put Christ first in their lives." Either that or all four symptoms point to the kind of person who would be inclined to try actually putting Christ first to begin with. See? We're a very objective press, huh?

Now that we have an idea who we're dealing with, who are we dealing with? First of all, John Fitz. It was only logical to start with someone administering the Campus Crusade on this campus. John is originally from Georgia if I remember right, and his accent still indicates something like it. He graduated from MIT not so long ago, and now wears a sporty moustache and a Bible. He speaks: "We're concentrating on individual contacts now. We've got about 200 firm members and we're spreading out from that one by one, by word of mouth." The idea, he said, was to reach the freshmen who are not only soft and impressionable but are likeliest to stick around to receive more Word per capita. Blanket coverage like those Bibles last semester (remember those? The one you leveled your stereo with?) is out for the time being at least. Who paid for those Bibles? "Donations." A large one coming from John Fitz, I learned later on. He backs his word.

Ah, well. Christianity is a missionary faith, don't forget. If you're going to follow Christ's teachings you're going to be an evangelist. That was one of Our Lord's last words to his disciples, and it means laying your message on your brother whenever the opportunity affords. In face-to-face situations this is all to the good. You may not arrive at a shattering Pentecostal awakening, but in a give and take situation you're liable to clarify a few concepts for each other at the very least. Okay. There are those, however, for whom this isn't enough, so they print pamphlets.

Now, I don't know who does the layout on some of these giveaways but I feel pretty sure that the concept and the final approval come right back on sincere faceless men in Hollywood and Valley Forge who really think they're reaching the kids. Well, maybe not, because it's fairly obvious that their true goal is selling the kinds, but a lame-er more pathetic attempt is practically off the scale, imagination-wise. I have here in my hand Exhibit A, a glossy brochure with a purple-and-blue spiral on the cover running down a black ground and converging on a rather peculiarly attired youth who is opening his mouth and acting distressed. Across the lowerer half of the cover, the lend: WAYOUT. We note the valiant attempt at an imitation of psychedelic poster lettering, and we ask, "How long has it been since you responded positively to psychedelic poster lettering?"

With rising gorge, we turn the front page of this, our WAYOUT magazine. We see a young man with sandles, white levi cords, slicked down hair and four bristles on his upper lip, a real everyteen, right, looking insincere and brandishing ten arms (in slick sandwiched-negative style; a subliminal cut at eastern religions? You bet!) filled with money, knives, bottles, cigarettes, flowers (flowers?), other symbolic devices. He sits on a purple plaster pedestal, with "I Love Me" taped to it. Directly across from this gentleman is the word SIN done in crimson and violet, five inches high. Complete text: "Who says SIN is not lying, stealing, cheating, making-love?" Jesus Christ! Pardon my language.

Following pages cover SEX, DRUGS, WAR in equally good style. It's all very visual, the kind of stuff a hermit in the wilds of Arkansas might look at and say "Why, that's PSYCHEDELIC - isn't it?" It's such a pitifully transparent camoflage-job that by the time you get around to the pitch on the last page you regard the whole deal as a moral outrage instead of a bad joke. They could have done better. I can see it now.

Two fourteen-year-olds are poring over a magazine the size of Life. But it's not Life. On the cover, a naked, slightly flabby woman in a blond wig and ratty garter belt is spreadeagled on a rayon plush leopardskin. Below her, the words LOVE IS. What a hot one! Our horny little subjects turn the page. They read: Love is not the problem? The problem with love our own inner human nature. What do we mean by "Love?" By "Love" Christians mean...Wow! Tell your friends!

You don't think it's the same? Why not? The taste is only one peg lower.

Consider Andre Kole. What's his real name? Never mind that. He's a Christian magician, er, illusionist. I missed his set here last semester, but I caught it in England last Spring. He visited my art college, and he brought his advertising with him. Do the dead return??? "Unmasking the Unknown" is the title Mr. Kole gives to this intriguing presentation in which, among other things, he will give a visible demonstration of the fourth dimension."

After a short time in our culture, people should be experts at detecting the approach of a shuck. Do you smell one coming? Do you see that all you need for a visible demonstration of the fourth dimension is a $9.00 Timex? The fact is, and I humbly admit it, that I don't have the vaguest idea how Mr. Kole chose to demonstrate the fourth dimension. I saw him appear in a blue suit coat, a red-checked shirt and a string tie, heard him introduce himself in a--was it--Texas accent, and watched aghast as he pulled out a deck of cards and asked for a volunteer...I left. I would have stayed on, even then, but the girl I was with kept elbowing me in the ribs. There was just no competition.

I tried to explain this as respectfully as I could to John Fitz. He told me I should have stuck around until Andre warmed up. He does a series of progressively more mystifying tricks, which he always "unmasks" afterwards, and then presents a talk on the Miracles of Christ. And I get this creeping feeling that the Crusade is aiming at the lightest mental lightweights they can find.

"Isn't it strange how all the more intelligent people you know are in the Crusade."

"How long have you been in the Crusade?"

"Oh, about two weeks. I joined because I was so impressed with Andre Kole."

That was a rough rendition of an actual exchange. Later on I ate supper with a small group of Christian students in a dorm room. Hamburger spiked with pineapple wedges and a sweet-sour ketchup sauce, like you might find written up in Family Circle. I asked about Andre. "Well, Andre Kole appeals to some people, and to some others he just doesn't." I asked about "Explo '72" a Christian convention scheduled for this summer in Dallas. Why Dallas, a city of what you might call Negative Vibes? Because, they said, it's centrally located East- West (I checked a map, that's exactly true) and it has good convention facilities. "And there's local support?" "And there's local support."

When not parading around the Cotton Bowl, they will be training seriously for their missionary roles. More and more they tend to be well-drilled and eager to argue, and it shows up in discussion. Unfortunately, there's a tendency to get the same answer, almost word for word, from different people on the same question. It's not just parroting back, it's more like interpreting a manifesto, and the variety suffers. Ask "How do we know...?" and you get a twelve-part plan.

I tried a different tack. "Is it true that the Crusade is just a vast conspiracy on the part of Southerners and Mid-Westerners to take over the world? Why is everybody from the South and Mid-West?" Dennis, from Ohio, laughed and said no, no conspiracy, just coincidence. My roommate asked them if they thought maybe God was really Maynard G. Krebbs, who meant so well and blew it. That one went right past. Next. Case Histories? All very normal, very sincere. One girl had been kicked permanently out of her home because of her belief, though. They've all taken some abuse.

Did they have pamphlets? They had armloads. They agreed some of them were pretty rank. Dennis produced a snapshot of Derek and Sue in a compromising position. Derek and Sue protested. Dennis pointed to his recent growth of hair and beard. Did he know of any real weirdoes, hairy Bible-wavers I could talk to, for spice? No, but he offered to beat me with a brass-bound Bible and exorcise my demons for me. I thanked him very much. Someone pointed to a black object of undefined origin hanging in the window looking like an old radio condenser, whose purpose is to ward off Satan. "Look how straight I am," said Sue. "Look how long my skirt is." It was around mid-thigh. Like I said, average. "I'm really straight now. I wasn't always—I used to be in trouble...but I'm really straight now."

Did anyone know the Navigators? Sure. What were they like? All big, really healthy types from the Mid West; I'd know one by the way he crushed my fingers in a handshake. Was that right? Yes.

The next day, I met Chuck Strittmatter of the Navigators, and organization that began by ministering to the armed services and has since branched out. They've been called "tough-minded." "Actually," Strittmatter said, "you know how they've got the Special Forces in the Army, the Green Berets?" He looked to see if I was following. "Well, that's us. We're the shock troops in the movement."

They'd brought down Russ Johnson, Christian Revolutionary, who had spoken at Mahar the night previous. I would have been on hand, except for Temptation which came to me in the guise of a billiard ball, and so I shot snooker instead. I met Johnson face-to-face at last, and he crushed my hand and gave it back. I apologized for missing his speech. "Well, buddy," he said, "you really missed something'."

I read their literature. It was hard-nosed and definitely male-oriented, but readable and believable. This was too solid and reasonable. Did they know of any good J-Freaks? They allowed as how I had the wrong bunch of fellas. Yeah. That much was pretty clear. Whether you like it or not, this is the kind of people associated with the Backbone of Our Nation, nothing more or less. A Parable: back upstairs in the dorm, I offered to lend Dennis a copy of Lord Buckley's hip Jesus-monologue "the Nazz." He didn't have a record player. None of them did. I guess that cuts out a lot of tensions. What does it mean? I refuse to speculate, and I feel like I should apologize to all these folks for bothering them.

The World of Anais Nin

By RICHARD DAVIS

It seems an impossible task to faithfully reproduce the essence of a dream in the world of words. No matter how many image provoking adjectives you seem to commit to paper you still feel frustrated; you still realize that this is only a poor replacement for that nocturnal phantasy. And the frustrations that this attempt brings with it are the same ones that emerge when an effort is made to describe the world of Anais Nin. Her world, which is a fusion of the dream state with daily life, is contained in her diaries. The language of the diaries is very much like river that flows down from the mountaintops to nourish a valley of life below. And certainly the mystery, miracle and rhythm of this flow is Anais Nin the woman, the writer, the artist. She is also a mother who is constantly giving birth to a language of the emotions and the senses.

Anais Nin was born in 1903 in Neuilly, a suburb of Paris. Her father Joaquin Nin was a compose-pianist and as a young child she accompanied him on many of his concert tours. Early in her childhood her father became a transient member of the family. His absence from the Nin household was one of the seeds of Anais' diary. She relates "The genesis of mine (diary) began with desire to keep a channel of communication with a lost father. It was intended for him and continued as the travel log of a child in a new country, as a record of family life, of books, of observations of people."

This diary became her garden of continually blossoming flowers. She gave it all her love and attention but was not merely content to see life on the surface, to see the result of a subterranean gestation. Her dairy had not only to tell what she experienced but what this experience meant and how it related to the world around her. As a young girl, caring for flowers in her backyard in New York she would remove the earth around them as they were growing. She was not satisfied with the final products. She wanted to watch the mystery of their growth, to see the "significant roots" as she called them.

As flowers die new seeds are quickly planted. Each person, each incident, each relation that she absorbs and passes through her diary is a flower whose course of life she sensitively watches while it lives in her garden. Some die quickly others live through many seasons.

Anais Nin as the author (center) surrounded by her variable forms.

Henry Miller is one flower that Anais gives a great deal of attention to. Miller enters her life as the cactus flower reaching out for life in a black spring. His shell grew out of a necessity to survive the street life. Anais attempts to break through this shell. It was from a distance that she first perceived Miller in Paris in the 1930's. At such a distance only his surface features seemed visible but reading her first impressions of Miller one senses Anais' overpowering drive to begin the search of this man's soul instantly. "When I saw Henry Miller walking towards the door where I stood waiting, I closed my eyes for an instant to see him by some other inner eye. He was warm, joyous, relaxed, natural."

"He would have passed anonymously through a crowd. He was slender, lean, not tall. He looked like a Buddhist monk, a rosey-skinned monk, with his partly bald head aureoled by lively silver hair, his full sensuous mouth. His blue eyes are cool and observant, but his mouth is emotional and vulnerable. His laughter is contagious and warm like a Negro voice."

Since it is her sensitivity to people and situations that is her life, her diary; her first impressions need not settle in her brain to be distorted by the demon of speculation. She has earned the right to no longer be conscious of the passage of time in her relations with her garden and her flowers. Henry Miller walks into her life and as she relates the first impression of aman that she only knew as a conglomeration of brutal, violent, farcical literary escapades she feels life. Here was a seed that was carried by the wind and fatefully fell into the rich soil of her garden. Miller could not have entered her life any other way.

Anais spends a great deal of her sensitive energies exploring the world of Henry Miller. The composer's daughter meets the tailor's son. They nourish each other with their mutual drive to be a vital part of the world that they are attempting to put into words. Miller sees a violent world that needs to be hit with sexual farce and Pantegruelian word play. Anais sees this vision of Miller's and understands how important it is for this man to be taken seriously. Throughout the diaries they explore each others world. Anais is introduced to the Parisian prostitutes that Miller has befriended and Miller begins to see how the dream world is an essential part of the waking state. But they are strong personalities who must be master of the creation of their vision of the world. By the Summer of 1947 (fourth diary) they have both spent time apart, creating the worlds that they feel confortable in. These worlds are universes apart and Anais and Miller are no longer capable of the intimate exchange of new perceptions that colored their growth together. While travelling around America, Anais stops in to visit Miller at his home in Big Sur. She stays only a few hours and finds it difficult to converse with this new Miller that she is not familiar with. "I should not have visited Miller. As soon as one ceases to know a person intimately, the knowledge of them is from the outside, as if you stood at a window looking in. From this day on I would see Henry from the outside, in that sense I call not knowing. Through other's eyes, through his writing, or through his wife. Other Henrys. Knowing is intimacy. Intimacy takes trust and faith. That was over."

Henry Miller is only one flower in Anais' garden. He is given attention in many pages of the diaries but there are many others present who make it possible for Anais to say what she felt was important. Without relation, in every sense of the word, there would be no Anais Nin. Why was she so compelled to write her diaries? What was she trying to say? These answers are repeated in every word of her prodigous personal outpourings. To take a passage out of its matrix of the diary and use it as proof of a generality of purpose is tantamount to Faustian sin. Proteus would only laugh deceptively while he displayed yet another form but Anais allows the reader to see the form of the moment and feel it as much as is possible in the act of reading.

A Factual Low-Keyed Approach to Good Nutrition

By STEVE CLINE

Diet For A Small Planet

Frances Moore Lappe

This book shows you how to get adequate, quality protein in your daily diet from non-meat sources, and it also shows you why you should think seriously about doing so. Whether your reasons for turning away from meat might be ecological, ethical, spiritual, or economic, this book will give you solid evidence to help substantiate your position. Even if you have no intention of ever becoming a vegeterian, you owe it yourself to read this book and hear the no-meat argument stated logically and factually. Lappe has documented and researched her position well.

Lappe says on page three, "What I will be suggesting in this book is a guideline for eating from the earth that both maximizes the earth's potential to meet man's nutritional needs and, at the same time, minimizes the disruption of the earth necessary to sustain him. It's as simple as that."

She starts out by destroying some of the myths concerning meat and diet that are so pervasive in this country most Americans do not realize they are myths. The first part of the book is full of amazing, and disgusting, information: livestock, in the U.S., are fed eight pounds of protein for every pound of protein it produces (in beef the ration is 21 to 1); one half of all harvested agricultural land in the U.S. is planted with livestock feed crops (89% of the corn crop goes to livestock); and perhaps most condemning, the amount of protein we waste each year, by feeding most of our plant protein to livestock, is enough to make up ninety per cent of the entire world's yearly protein deficit! The first section is bursting with similar facts about American dietetic and agricultural practices.

Part two of the book is an explanation of protein, how we get it, what we use it for, and how we can get it without eating meat.

Protein is made up of amino acids. There are eight amino acids which the body cannot synthesize, and of these, there are four that are most likely to be missing in non-meat sources. The problem is that the body does not store amino acids, and if the right amino acids are not present in the right proportions, all excess is converted into carbohydrates. Legumes, grains, and seeds and nuts are not all deficient in each of the four amino acids. Instead, the members of each of these groups have similar strengths and weaknesses, and the groups themselves vary. What this book does is show you how to complement plant protein, how to match up the strengths of one item with the weakness of another, for example, cornmeal and beans, or grains and milk. By complementing protein, more total protein is made available than if the two items are eaten separately at different times. The increase can be dramatic, sometimes as much as forty three per cent, as in the case of rice and legumes.

The third section is the application of part two. In it Lappe sets up a simple system by which you can do your own protein complementing. It's fairly easy to do, and she not only supplies charts, but gives the reader enough information to feel confident enough to try it.

The last section, half the book, is comprised of recipes. The recipes range from salads to main courses to deserts, and they all make use of complementary protein relationships. Some of the results can be surprising. Two cornmeal-soy waffles (which are delicious) supply 30-36% of the average minimum protein allowance.

Unlike most other books in this area, Diet for a Small Planet is factual, down-to-earth, and low key. It fills the gap that now exists between the growing awareness of our society's misuse of food resources and attempts at personal, practical solutions. It is a book worthy of everyone's attention, particularly those interested in a saner approach to living on our small planet. And, for $1.25, it's worth a million times the price, literally.

A Funny, Not Funky, Sweet Story

By FRANK BAGLIONE

The Abortion: an historical romance 1966 by Richard Brautigan 226 pp. Simon and Schuster (paper) $1.95.

When Richard Brautigan first appeared on the literary scene it was as the merchant of gimmicky little tracts and collections of poems--all very strange, few any good. Behind the ornate facade of titles like Trout Fishing in America and In Watermelon Sugar stood a stagnant prose that perplexed the unwary reader expecting these shallows to give up some hidden brilliance.

Brautigan's first novel, Trout Fishing in America, was hailed as "a funny funky sweet and valuable book about the joys of wandering about in the world." Funky it was, but I have always been suspicious of things that are "funky"; valuable it was not. Unless of course one is looking for a mindless bit of distraction during a long plane ride or something to read while at the laundermat. Brautigan's book was the Readers' Digest of the youth culture. The style that of a modern day Bohemian, a hippie wandering about American in a stupor picking up on all the "wow" and "far out" things to see and comment upon in this land.

Trout Fishing in America, my introduction to Brautigan, was a collection of silly, unrelated stories, part recollections and part fantasy whose only theme--undeveloped and oblique--concerned trout fishing in America, sometimes an event and often various people. The literature, like the book's characters, was ragged and impoverished, simple and unimposing. At its best, it was a story about nobody doing nothing nowhere in particular, and doing it in the most boring manner possible. I should have never read past the dedication. "For Jack Spicer and Ron Loewinsohn," who my experts tell me were two poets that had been writing and publishing in "Little Mags" for over ten years. The late Jack Spicer was the better poet and is said to have influenced several contemporary poets that most people (outside of a small cadre of aficionados and students in esoteric English classes) have never heard of, and with good cause.

Given all this, it is not surprising that certain critics, refugees from reality and post-adolescent street urchins hailed Brautigan as a "gifted innovator in our literature." If this were the case, innovation would mean obliqueness, gimmicky writing and a contrived esoteric style. Once again what is bizarre and grotesque is misnamed creative (no one wants to admit having overlooked talent should it be there).

Surprisingly, in Brautigan's The Abortion, talent did appear. It did not come in choppy, unrelated, confused little stories, nor in smug, silly descriptions or falsely ingenuous observations like in Trout Fishing. Rather it appeared in a wistful, unpretentious story about an abortion. The Abortion is actually about what the title says. It is not a great book, but considering the author's history it is a delightful and dear piece of literature.

Written in the first person autobiographical, The Abortion begins with an introduction to the storyteller, an unnamed man thirty-one years old who has for three years been the librarian of an interesting sort of library. "We don't use the Dewey decimal classification or any index system to keep track of our books. We record their entrance into the Library Contents Ledger and then we give the book back to its author who is free to place it anywhere he wants in the library, on whatever shelf catches his fancy. It doesn't make any difference where the book is placed because nobody ever checks them out and nobody ever comes here to read them. This is not that kind of a library. This is another kind of library."

The first author we meet is an old woman who has brought her book on "Growing Flowers in Hotel Rooms by

Richard Brautigan

Candlelight." Other titles accepted that day included My Trike by Chuck, a pictoral of the child's tricycle; The Culinary Dostoevski by a man who claims the recipes are picked out of Dostoevski's books; Your Clothes Are Dead; and The Egg Layed Twice. Not all the books that are brought in to this small San Francisco library for "losers" are kept on the premises; at various intervals a man named Foster, who we meet later in the book, comes in his van to collect books for storage in some caves up north.

As the librarian lovingly reviews the titles brought to him that day and at all hours of the night (you ring a little bell after hours to gain admittance) his girlfriend Vida sleeps in the back room. Vida is described as an extraordinarily beautiful woman. "She had very large fully realized breasts and an incredibly tiny waist and large full hips that tapered down into long majestic legs. Her body was very sensual, inciting one to think of lust, while her face was Botticellian and set your mind voyaging upon the etheral."

The librarian had first met Vida some months back when she had come late at night to bring a book to the library. At that time beneath flashing black hair was an awkward unhappy girl with a book about her body--she hated it. "It's too big for me. It's somebody else's body. It's not mine." The librarian tries to cheer her up with a candy bar, then some Gallo sherry, then, he being such a good lad, she spends the night with him, then every night. There is no drawn out glorified sex scene. Vida likes our librarian because he desires her without grossness, without lechery like all the other men she battles off day after day.

The absence of lasciviousness is insufficient a protection against conception, however, and the couple soon faces parenthood. The modern day solution?--"The decision to have an abortion was arrived at without bitterness and was guided by gentle necessity." Necessity comes clothe in some rather shallow and self-serving excuses. Like some frightened idiot child of an undergraduate, Vida whines, "I'm not ready to have a child yet. I love children but this isn't the time. If you can't give them the maximum of yourself, then it's best to wait. There are too many children in the world and not enough love. An abortion is the only answer." Heavens! Who wishes a child you can't love? The couple decides to use the pill in the future.

The abortion is arranged through Foster, a large, long-haired blond who stores the library books in the caves up north. He arrives in his van after having contacted a doctor in Tijuana who had taken care of an Indian girl Foster had playfully caused to become pregnant in the past. Foster reluctantly agrees to take care of the library in the couple's absence.

The trip to Mexico is artfully described by the librarian who has not been outside his library-home for three years. Vida drives the van to the airport--the librarian has never flown before: "It was grey and cold outside without any hope for the sun. We were now taking off. We started moving down the runway, slow at first, then faster, faster, faster: my God! I looked at the wing below me. The rivets in the wing looked awfully gentle as if they were not able to hold anything up. The wing trembled from time to time ever so gently, but just enough to put the subtle point across...From time to time we hit invisible things in the air that made the plane buck like some phantom horse."

The couple takes a bus from San Diego to Tijuana. "Our hands were together in our hands as our real fate moved closer to us. Vida's stomach was flat and perfect and it was going to remain that way." The librarian constantly reminds us of Vida's startling beauty. Every pass, every whistle, every man that walks into something while looking longingly at her (and just about every man does including a priest) is carefully noted. Dr. Garcia alone is not smitten. Their friendly, industrious Mexican abortionist had his mind on other things.

Vida is one of three women that will have an abortion that morning. There is a young American girl with her parents--"Though she possessed a narrow budding female body, looked as if she were too young to have an abortion. She should have been doing something else." Another woman, who the librarian never sees, arrives later with her stern, tense husband. The abortions are handled quickly and simply. Dr. Garcia: "I won't hurt you and it will be clean. Nothing left after and no pain, honey. Believe me. I'm a doctor." The doctor was assisted by two teenage Mexican youths, one boy and one girl. The boy was the last one to see "the fetus and the abortion leftovers." "I heard a toilet flush and water running from a tap and then the sound of water being poured in the toilet and the toilet was flushed again and the boy came back with the bucket.

"The bucket was empty."

Vida makes a quick recovery and the couple return to San Francisco. The librarian discovers that a woman who had been bringing in her book took over his job (much the same way he had taken over the library three years ago). The librarian is distraught, but Vida is pleased that now they can begin living like "real people." In a somewhat poor conclusion we find Vida, Foster and the ex-librarian living together. Foster finds a Pakistani girlfriend and a job with a steel company; the librarian mans a table at Berkeley; and Vida gets a job as a topless waitress and is saving her money to go back to school. She probably makes them all rich.

These amateurish touches occur throughout the book whenever Brautigan is unable to make a transition. His chronicling style is rich in detail but continually comes up with lose ends. Rather then guide us into their new lives he simply drops us into them, a little deus ex machina that swoops up the characters and arranges them in a new setting. But even with the abruptness and undeveloped portions of the plot, the story manages to hang together quite well as a whole. It is light and yet substantive. Brautigan catches you smiling every once in a while with some cute observation or description. The occasional leaps are not so noticeable in this fast moving book.

More important, Brautigan succeeds in getting the reader genuinely interested in his characters. They are approachable and entertaining and very interesting. One finds themselves wanting to know more of their past lives and more of their future. Their is a small tinge of regret when the final page is reached--a sweet story has ended. A funny sweet story, and, happily, this one is not "funky."

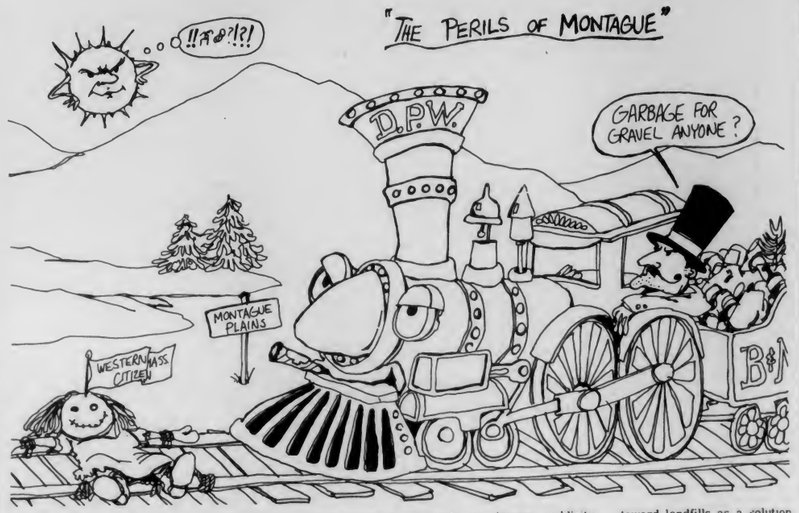
The Perils of Montague

By RICK MILLIKEN



Last week in our first WMPIRG column, we discussed the background and basic geological facts of the Montague Dump controversy. This week we start to look at some of the underlying conflicts that make the Montague Dump stink more than it should. Also we shall look at how a small town such as Montague-Turners Falls went about fighting the proposed landfill and their relative success.

The Montague landfill if passed would be the largest landfill operation in the world. It would be able to take in 500 tons of refuse a day for twenty years. Landfill dumps are ugly. They often do more harm than good, scarring the landscapes, polluting lakes, streams and wells, bringing rats and sometimes disease.

To many interests, Montague Plains is a perfect site for a landfill. The B & M railroad owns the landfill site through a subsidiary Charlestown Waterfront Inc. The site is on the railroad's main line. It was originally acquired to use as an ultra modern switching yard and the town of Montague backed the plan, giving the railroad a cost break in acquiring the land. In 1969, the B M wrote a short proposal on the possibilities of a landfill in Montague Plains. An interesting quote from that report was that transportation of the refuse was "not to be made unnecessarily difficult by a variety of methods." B & M would make money through the sale of the land and also from the transportation of the refuse from Boston to Montague and the reverse trips of sand and gravel from Montague to Boston. This is quite an economic boost for the beleagered B & M.

This brings us to the D.P.W. who also believe Montague is an ideal location. It hired the consultant firm of Whitman-Howard to research the site. Whitman-Howard heartily agreed with the B & M study. The DPW was so pleased with the Whitman-Howard Report, it tried to ram the report down the throats of the Public Health Commission and Natural Resource Commission a week later. Without the two departments concurring the landfill could not go through. Why would the DPW act so hastily? What do they have to gain?—Only 600 million dollars worth of sand and gravels to be dug out from the Montague Plains.

The DPW has over twenty other sites for landfills in the Western part of the state. Obviously Montague Plains is the most desirable site for its profitable sands and gravels and its value to the B & M railroad. The DPW has kept these other sited a well kept secret although it is the public's right to know their locations.

Boston citizens do not care one way or the other. Landfills are not a topic of conversation around Boston dinner tables. As long as the refuse goes somewhere--anywhere.

Everyone gains from the Montague Plains Landfill except for the citizens of Montague and Western Mass. The private interests are in a powerful position to lobby for the site, and it would be difficult for the citizens of a poor town such as Turners Falls to fight them. They were up against a stacked deck.

Dr. Ward Motts, a UMass hydro-geologist, undertook an independent study of the Montague Plains. His work concluded that the site was totally unfit. He stated the area was a loadstone of fresh water which if disturbed would cause a loss of a billion gallons annually. He further stated that the Whitman-Howard Report was poorly done. The site would ruin the water supply of the town of Montague, Lake Pleasant and the state Fish Hatchery. He concluded that more extensive studies are called for.

With Dr. Motts' report as a base the town of Montague began its fight against the landfill. They formed a citizens' group called DUMP--Don't Upset Montagues' Plains. This army of protestors was led by Walter T. Kostanski, Franklin County Register of Deeds. Kostanski is a former Republican Whip and a veteran of skirmishes involving the environment. DUMP contacted environmental and public interest groups. Citizens flocked to help. Committees were formed.

Their Scientific Committee was under the direction of Dr. Frank Kaminski of the UMass Engineering Dept. For the further studies of the Plains that Dr. Motts suggested, it would cost about $30,000. DUMP decided the best course of action would be to put the burden of proof on the DPW since Montague could not afford the expense of the new studies.

High school students began a petition drive and wrote letters to the Governor and other influential agencies.

There were reports that the B & M was so confident of having the landfill approved that they were moving in new rails for extensions into the Plains. To guard against immediate action by the DPW and B & M, DUMP decided to obtain the services of a lawyer skilled in injunction proceedings. The lawyer would cost $15,000 but the town felt his services were worth the price. An injunction could hold the DPW for six months.

Representative Tom Simons from Turners Falls was working through state house channels to arrange a meeting with the Governor. DUMP believed this was the most effective course of action to have their scientific arguments heard. An intense publicity campaign was undertaken. Dr. Motts and Mr. Kostanski were able to meet with Ralph Nader during his speaking tour of Western Mass for WMPIRG. Newspapers, TV, and radio were contacted. People around the state were eventually made aware of the plight of Montague. Petitions were signed, editorials written, influential people began to speak out questioning the state's action.

Finally, February 15, the leaders of DUMP met with State Secretary of the Environment Charles Foster. The meeting was also to be with Secretary of Public Health Peter Goldmark who was curiously missing. His department is in charge of landfill operations. He did not even send a representative from his department. Although DUMP had sent numerous letters to him and his department,--he had never replied.

The meeting was held in a friendly atmosphere in the Senate Waiting Room. DUMP presented Secretary Foster with the petitions and its scientific testimony. While the meeting was in session many state representatives dropped by to register their opposition to the landfill.

Everyone agreed that the state should not be looking toward landfills as a solution. Secretary Foster spoke of the state's research into recycling. The state was also investigating the possibility of a high temperature incinerator much like the one used in Montreal.

Foster stated that he did not have the power to stop the landfill for he was only a cabinet member but he would report back to the Governor. He encouraged the people from Montague with the news that there was a moratorium on landfills. Nothing would be moving forward at the Montague site. A new study reevaluating the state's methods of selecting landfill sites and the whole question of refuse disposal was being undertaken. It would be on the Governor's desk that Friday and that Montague should "sit tight" until the report is made public. Secretary Foster did say that Montague "will be relieved" at some of the recommendations of the report. He said also that the report would examine the possibilities of getting maximum citizen participation into landfill-incinerator site selection. The people of Montague now must wait for the Governor's decison and prepare for perhaps another battle.

Can George Do It?

By REID FISHMAN

"The current dilemma in Vietnam is a clear demonstration of the limitations of military power. Our policy there is a policy of moral debacle and military defeat."

Those words were spoken on September 24, 1963, by the freshman Senator from South Dakota. By doing this, George McGovern became the first United States Senator to speak out against American military involvement in Southeast Asia.

Now, almost nine years later, George McGovern is still speaking out against that very same war. But others have jumped on the bandwagon, and the ears of an unresponsive administration still refuse to listen. Because of this, and many other reasons, George McGovern has decided to run for the office of President of the United States.

The announcement was formally made on January 18, 1971. It was an unprecedented early announcement, but necessary in order to conduct the campaign with candor, and, at the same time, to make up lost ground on his opponents. Since then, he has not only made up lost ground, but has been gaining support and now expects to receive at least 25% in New Hampshire. As of now, all indications prove this to be very possible.

Senator McGovern is not just a "one-issue candidate", as many people feel. It is true that he has been in the forefront of the Vietnam issue ever since he took office, but that is definitely not his only issue.

In fact, for over twenty years, and throughout his Congressional career, McGovern has advocated a basic re-examination of American China policy. He has always advocated any effort to recognize the People's Republic of China as the sole legitimate government of China, and for twenty years he has suggested the basic steps that the president is just taking now.

Senator McGovern also believes in a re-ordering of national priorities. As far back as 1963, McGovern introduced the first bill designed to aid the transition to a full-employment peacetime economy. Since then, he has introduced numerous other bills to change our national priorities.

George McGovern has always been a leader in the fight against hunger and malnutrition both at home and abroad. He was the first director of President Kennedy's "Food for Peace" program to provide food relief for the world's hungry. As chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs, he has virtually led the fight against malnutrition here in the United States. As author of the Food Stamp Act, he has said, "If Americans can set a deadline to put a man on the moon, there is no reason why we cannot set a deadline to end hunger."

Concerning drugs, McGovern feels that the judicial system should be changed to provide rehabilitation for drug addicts, rather than punishment. He has also recently supported stands to make the laws concerning marijuana similar to those concerning alcohol.

George McGovern

As far as the FBI is concerned, McGovern was the first Senator to question the authority of J. Edgar Hoover, as director of the organization. To quote Senator McGovern, "Responsible to no one, Mr. Hoover has become irresponsible. Unchecked by Congress, unsupervised by the Executive, the Hoover regime has resulted in an American tragedy." McGovern has cited instances of definite discrimination and corruption within the FBI. He advocates a full investigation into the activities of the FBI.

Senator McGovern has been at the front of the battle for equal rights and opportunities for over ten years. He was the only Senator to support the Congressional Black Caucus Program and various other Black programs. He advocates full support of Cesar Chavez in his efforts to insure a fair income for California farm workers, and he believes in equal representation and opportunities for all Mexican-Americans. He is the only presidential candidate to support the efforts of the Women's and Gay Liberation movements to combat discrimination because of sex or sexual beliefs. As former chairman of the Senate Indian Affairs Subcommittee, he worked extensively to better the plight of the American and Alaskan Native. On April 3, 1971, he said, "You can't play games with people anymore. You either give them what they deserve, or they will give you what you deserve."

Concerning the Draft, McGovern has always advocated an all volunteer army and has introduced many bills to further this conviction. He feels that young men should not have to choose between fighting in a war they oppose, or going to jail.

These are just a few of the many issues on which George McGovern takes a definite stand. I think most of you will agree with me that he is the best candidate, but what are his chances of winning? If someone were to ask me that question one year ago, I would have said that he didn't have a chance. But every day that statement becomes more false and his chances increase greatly.

For instance, last month, in New Hampshire, two polls were taken two weeks apart. In the first, McGovern scored a mere 4 percent, but in fourteen days his standing increased one percent per day, so that in the second poll, McGovern scored 18 percent.

In other situations, McGovern topped polls at the University of Florida, the University of New Hampshire, Yale University, the University of Missouri, and Fresno State College. He was endorsed by state caucuses in Massachusetts, Florida, and Pennsylvania, and showed well in those of Iowa and Arizona.

In an article in this week's New Republic magazine, Arthur Schlesinger Jr. cites why he feels McGovern is the best candidate. He states, "McGovern's is not only the right candidacy—it is also a realistic candidacy."

Other McGovern supporters and workers include former Senator Gruening (who was one of the two U.S. Senators to vohagainst the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution), Aaron Fox, William Sloan Coffin, and Robert Drinan.

Here on campus, McGovern support is growing rapidly. The Students for McGovern group has almost seventy-five active workers, and a group called Faculty for McGovern is currently being formed. There have been and will be various voter registration drives and all students are urged to register on campus so they can easily vote in the primary on April 25th. When Senator McGovern came to UMass, he received standing ovations both before and after his speech from an overflow Student Union Ballroom crowd of some two thousand persons.

There are also McGovern organizations either already formed, or currently being formed at the fourteen other schools in the first district. Each is meeting with tremendous success.

Funds for the McGovern campaign have come almost entirely from small contributions. Most of these contributions have come through the mail or from local volunteer groups going door-to-door asking for money. This allows Senator McGovern to conduct a campaign without owing political favors to large contributors and corporations, as do most of the other candidates.

Thanks to student organizations, over 500 students canvass door-to-door for McGovern in New Hampshire each weekend and over 70,000 New Hampshire homes have been canvassed already. This is many more than Gene McCarthy had canvassed in 1968, at this stage of the campaign.

The future of the McGovern campaign depends on the primaries. In order to win, McGovern should finish at least third in the New Hampshire primary, and show fairly well in the Florida primary. In that case, he should do well in the Wisconsin and Nebraska primaries, and then, Massachusetts will be the test.

Whatever the case, the McGovern campaign will have shown without a doubt that it is possible to conduct a campaign without being dominated by big business. It will have proved that honesty and candor can be a part of politics. It will have shown that the student vote is an instrumental new part in American political activity, and it will have shown that a candidate has to have more than good looks and charisma to win under our political system.

The McGovern campaign might show that the American people can tell when it's time for a change. It might show that an underdog can make it to the top. It might show that the students can unite behind a candidate and determine the outcome of an election, and it might show that the American people are capable of electing a president that they can be proud of.

It's up to each individual to decide the fate of the McGovern campaign. Each penny donated, each smiling face received at a lonely door, each vote will tell what the McGovern campaign will show.

"To remain silent in the face of policies that one believes to be hurting the nation is not patriotism, but moral cowardice. Backing our soldiers in Vietnam does not mean cheering them on to their deaths in aquiescence to what one regards as a dangerously ill-conceived course. Criticism of public policy does not weaken the nation; rather it serves to refine, correct, and strengthen our national course. If the policy is sound, it will become better understood and therefore more effective under the searchlight of honest debate; if not sound, it can best be remedied by constructive examination and frank discussion."

American Society Explained In 5,000 Cliches Or Less

Part One: The Economy And Thereabouts

By DONALD D. ROBADUE, JR.

Few if any of us, are able to stretch our heads up and out of the foxholes of our largely subjective views of the world and look, to use a dirty word in contemporary art, objectively at the giant organizations and institutions by which our society orders its existence, and to notice the profound changes that are occurring in this society.

Unfortunately, popular writers on the subject don't seem to do much better than us in examining the outside. For example, Alvin Toffler, who wrote Future Shock, was the first to tell us, using a carefully numbered bibliography of 359 references, that we all are reeling and spinning down the magical linear timespan that transports us into the future and being knocked off our feet by the 'shock' of this experience. This is how Toffler got to coin his very own cliche - future shock, which, ironically enough, people don't seem to use much. And there is Charles Reich, who wrote The Greening of America, a book that bubbles over with liberal truisms and, in its peculiar way, expounds upon the popular view, among writers at least, that America is in need of or is experiencing a 'revolution' in its society.

Essential changes in our society are indeed occurring and need understanding. But for the time being these and other popularized versions of the process will be set aside in favor of some largely unnoticed and perhaps more reliable books on the subject.

Peter Drucker, who has written a lot of books about man, management, technology, and the future, published The Age of Discontinuity in 1968. I was first attracted to the book because it happened to be sitting right next to another book on the library shelf entitled The New American Society, published in 1971, written by Joseph Bensman and Arthur Vidich. In 1950 Vidich & Bensman had written what is now the complementary volume to their present work, Small Town in Mass Society, which dealt with the pressure exerted by American society to bring change to small towns. Drucker and Bensman & Vidich deal, in a mutually consistent way, with the significant changes that are occurring in the structure of American society.

The first big change, coming after WW II, as Drucker maintains and Bensman & Vidich more or less confirm, is that the economy is knowledge and technology oriented. The new growth industries don't make dishwashers and transformers and cars, they make TV's, telephones, computers, endless reams of reports and research projects, new materials, plastics being the only widely marketed new material of the century, teachers, and other products and services using technology developed in the last fifty years. The old giants are slow to get involved in technologies that will be important in the future, outside of buying new companies up.

The second change is one that nobody is surprised at: we are a society of organizations, not simply of people. There is an organization for every purpose that at one time in history, the family took care of, beyond the traditional duties of the government to protect the people from outside aggression. Now people are educated by schools, cured by doctors in hospitals, amused by TV, find meaning in life through participation in organizations, serviced in every imaginable way by repairmen and professionals, and for some, even supported by the state. We are employed by large organizations and governed by the grand-daddy of bureaucracies, the Federal government.

"it may make a revolutionary feel really radical and powerful when he denounces such a thing, but that doesn't make him more right in his position."

Understanding what is going on in America means understanding its institutions, which include its economy. Contrary to Reich's view that it is the artists, writers, and students who know what is going on and 'what is to come', the highly subjective intellectualizing done by these people is of little value in understanding change. This task requires the acute perception of occurences that are and will be different from the experiences of the present day that a student, for example, might base his subjective dreams or nightmares about the world on. A case of this is the now passe belief that the United States is run by a military-industrial complex. It may make a revolutionary feel really radical and powerful when he denounces such a thing, but that doesn't make him any more right in his position.

Our economy is not a war economy, it is a knowledge economy. America does not produce anywhere near as much money manufacturing military hardward as it does in what can be considered a government-philanthropic foundation-university 'economic complex'. The people who are and will be running America politically, economically, and socially are not the lost and 'silent majority' of Agnew country, or the Nixonite middle class businessman and bureaucrat. It is the college educated professional Whatever-ist, who crawls through the cracks in every wall of the Federal government; reigns in foundations such as Rockefeller and Ford; is employed by and runs business; and coats the stomach linings of the universities, where he is born and raised. The 'working class', comprised of the guys who stick things together on an assembly line, is declining and constitutes only about 30% of the labor force. The 'common people' of America are and will be technicians, professional Whatever-ists, and the people who use technology and knowledge, government and the businessmen.

Drucker points out that nearly fifty percent of our economy is based on the research and dissemination of information. This includes education, all forms of mass communication, government and foundation supported research, business research, telephone, community TV antenae, computers and data processing. Bensman & Vidich outline the characteristics of the new middle class that is arising. It is the intellectual class, consisting of the college educated people who deal, one way or another, in the production of knowledge. They hold high paying jobs in corporations as well as in the government-foundation-university complex.

This class of knowledge workers exists, say Bensman & Vidich, not because the demand for them is necessarily so great, as Drucker believes, but simply because college educated people exist in large quantities and must be supported somehow or other. The intellectual class is reaping the benefits of a Keynesian view of economics which advocates the use of government spending as the way to keep the economy expanding.

The government does indeed spend a lot of money to support the people of the new middle class. Drucker states that 80% of all scientific research is paid for by the government. Yet only one fifth of new ideas, inventions and knowledge are the result of this work. Small private business is vastly superior in generating productive knowledge. Big research by the government or business is unproductive because any big organization, he maintains, is incapable of major innovation. Bureaucracy gets in the way unless provisions are made in its structure so that the management part of an organization does simply that, manage, while the rest of the organization is left to change and innovate freely.

In this light, it is ironic that the Federal government is constantly looked to for the solution of social problems when time after time it has proven itself incapable of innovation or intelligence. Certainly, it appears to be the only organization large enough and sufficiently omnipotent to do large scale things involving large scale problems in a non-partisan way. But the government is essentially conservative and protective. It is hardly a disinterested force, the politics are simply done behind closed doors. Innovation and change are the antithesis of stability in such an organization. Great Britain, the socialist wonder of the post WW II era, tries to support, with government money, industries that are soon to be outdated, such as steel. The Soviet Union can improve its agriculture only by changing its entire ideology, which it won't do.

The political stabilization of the intellectual class is wrought by the institutions in Bensman & Vidich's economic triad in a process they call 'co-optation'. Universities are the sources of rebellion for any country. It is easy to get a hold on the intellectuals and professionals that are being produced in increasing numbers thereby offering them positions practicing their interest for a decent salary. Once a part of the intellectual establishment, earning a respectable piece of 'the action', they no longer care to fight against it, or any other establishment they may believe in, while they are at work. When they go home at night they can do anything they please and nobody will say anything to them, as long as they did their work well. Organizations, contrary to our nightmarish view of them, don't care to regulate anything about the knowledge worker beyond what he produces for them.

Along this line, both Drucker and Bensman & Vidich point out that organizations are nothing but names on legal documents. People use them and run them, not nameless faces in a Kafka novel or in somebody's existential nightmare. Letting oneself be taken over by an organization occurs because one is empty to begin with. Without a sense of self it is easy to become wrapped up in machinery for its own sake. The three writers see organizations as existing for the individual, and are to be used by the individual. Drucker writes: "A society needs to be able to allow the individual to opt out and lead a 'private life'. But this is not freedom. This is indifference. In a free society, the citizen takes responsibility, above all, for his society and its institutions." Knowledge workers cannot afford to maintain a posture of amorality and disinterest in their work. Scrapping for grants may be an economic necessity for the university, but the eagerness to work on most anything the government offers, and the willingness of all of us to let the government be the one to solve our problems are irresponsible.

A belief in the sanctity of organizations and institutions rather than individual utilization and challenge of them runs rampant at UMass, and probably in most other universities. We remain ignorant of what our world is, and get stuck in the educational ruts we hide ourselves in. Political science, economics, sociology, psychology, literature, the fine arts, and philosophy all have to do, to a certain degree, with the same thing, man, particularly the kind that runs around in the United States. How can a student be tremendously interested in literature and strive to become a writer without caring to know what the society is actually like, preferring, as most contemporary 'artists' do, a self indulgent subjectivism that never enables him to crawl out of Southwest? It seems insane to study economics or government to the exclusion of sociology, when the former are merely two social institutions out of many studied by the latter. Likewise, to study sociology while remaining ignorant of the economy and politics is absurd. Yet we think nothing of it, accepting subject matter divisions as some kind of highest Truth.

To be even more general in this accusation of irresponsibility, how often do we, as students, challenge the authority of our professors; how often do we understand enough of what the professor is talking about to challenge him; and why do we sit blatantly uncritical of the stuff being thrown at us when it is bad and we do know it? There is fussing from time to time about teacher evaluation by a few people in the Student Senate. The classroom is where education is supposed to occur, and where teacher-student interaction is highly valued. We go to lecture day after day after day and sit passively as the professor expounds material we blindly trust to be true and accurate. In accepting this routine we support a system that stagnates by its own nature. We let tenure be a professor's prime concern before he gets it, and his pleasure once he does. We let ourselves be co-opted by believing that what we too want is a job with a nice salary and tenure, and the chance to hide away, pursuing our pastimes as a full time occupation. We are corrupt and irresponsible because we demand others to be responsible, rather

Both Drucker, and particularly Bensman & Vidich criticize students. It is well past the time to crawl out of our holes of subjectivity and get into the mainstream of society. But they recognize that being kept in a university for four years, (and I believe most of us aren't here because we want to be), makes it hard to find adult responsibilities to be concerned about, so we end up in a state of suspended adolescence while we wait our turn to become productive members of the society. We cannot be absorbed as uneducated and unskilled workers. There are too many of us for the economy to support in that way. We don't really want to be here out of any profound love of knowledge, as some professors might hope, we merely sit like lumps and listen uncaringly.

To this condition Bensman & Vidich suggest political commitment and action to make the university and every other organization and institution responsive rather than authoritarian. Drucker advocates personal responsibility in the same direction.

Bureaucracy and organization in business, government, and elsewhere, scares us. Nobody who spends twenty years of his life trying to break free from home and the responsibilities there likes the idea of dealing with hierarchies that make their family look like a single grain of sand compared to the rest of a beach. But if we know and understand what is happening to us we will be capable of the action and responsibility necessary to overcome our fears and groveling.

A lecture in Mahar. "We don't really want to be here out of any profound love of knowledge, as some professors might hope, we merely sit like lumps and listen uncaringly."

Neil Young Finally Comes Around

BY STEVE FELD

HARVEST--NEIL YOUNG (Reprise Records)

Ever since Neil Young started working on Harvest, one and a half years ago, it has been plagued by a myriad of problems. First of all, the album was to originally include two live numbers but this idea was aborted when Young had reoccuring back trouble. He had to cancel all of his performances and, ergo, the album was greatly delayed. Then, there was a conflict over the artwork for the album, which set back the release date another four months. And finally, Neil insisted on inspecting the already pressed record, one from each of the three Warner Brothers pressing plants, to insure the best quality possible for his fourth solo record.

It's because of all these hassles that Harvest comes across as being so uneven, unstructured and not fully realized. First of all, the album is insubstantial and leads one to believe that it became more and more aggravating as production dragged along. There are only ten songs on the album and they are relatively short. There can't possibly be an excuse for this except either laziness or apathy, because Neil Young is constantly writing new songs.

Harvest is sure gold for Young. Everyone of his solo albums have brought him closer to superstar status till finally After the Gold Rush, riding mainly on the impetus of "Southern Man", exploded into a million seller and likewise did the same for Everybody Knows This is Nowhere and Neil Young. Harvest is a potpourri of production, including electric, folk, country and western, pseudo-Bob Dylan and the London Symphony Orchestra. All these modes just tend to remove any cohesiveness and the album just fails to get off the ground.

For those who own either Live On Sugar Mountain or Young Man's Fancy, two of the Neil Young bootlegs, parts of Harvest will already be familiar to you. Four of the ten songs are on here, and, in what has to be a coincidence, they are among the best on the album.

The album starts off with exactly the same riff as in "Southern Man" and "Cowgirl in the Sand". Now, shit, I'm sure that Young has enough guitar-playing talent in order to think up some other kind of introduction to what is a good song, "Out On the Weekend". Backing him up in this song, and in just about every other, is the Stray Gators among whom are the familiar names of Jack Nitzsche and Kenny Buttrey. They are a country oriented group and likewise influenced the album.

For some strange reason, the title songs of Neil Young's albums are always among the weakest cuts on the album. "Everyone Knows This Is Nowhere" couldn't hold a light to most of the other stuff on that album, and "After the Gold Rush" was a terrible song after you heard it for the fifth time. In this grand tradition, "Harvest" follows. Nothing special here, we have to look elsewhere.

"A Man Needs A Maid" is, thankfully, much like "Helpless" and hearing the song a couple weeks from now will be ardupus. Until then, though, I'm gonna dig "Heart of Gold."

David Crosby and Graham Nash are around for "Are You Ready For the Country?", but they don't help what is already a hopeless cause. Young wears a superlative song. On his bootlegs, he talks about it: "I wrote this song under weird circumstances. I usually don't write my songs too fast, but all of a sudden I found myself not being able to move around too much and my mind started wandering. And when I got home I kept hearing this song over and over in my head. I didn't know what it meant when I first started hearing it--I'm just starting to see what it means now."

"A Man Needs A Maid" is a moving song with many dramatics. Here, also, is the London Symphony Orchestra. They work with Young instead of against him, and help bring about the full potential of the song. It is very personal, to the point of being esoteric, and defies any interpretation. It took Neil Young months before he could understand it.

By now, we all know "Heart of Gold", is a Neil Young classic. Sounding so very much like Bob Dylan without being any less original, Young, with the backup voices of James Taylor and Linda Ronstadt is at his best here. I fear though that the effects are ephemeral, the hell out of the three chords that make up most of the songs and the tuning up bit in beginning suggest that this is just a big bash with little or no thought as to how to implement it in any constructive way.

Neil Young on "Old Man": "This is a song I wrote about my ranch when I moved up North, out in the country. When I bought the place there was this old man who was working there for the people I bought it from. He was about 70 years old. He helped with the cattle, or something, and now he was too old to do much of anything.

Also helping on this song are, again, Mr. Taylor and Ms. Ronstadt. There is a banjo that adds a country feeling to the tune and the backing is simple and unobtrusive. "Old Man" impresses me as Young's answer to Stills' "4 20".

The London Symphony Orchestra is present again in "There's A World", only this time, it doesn't work. Instead of adding something to an already great song, like "A Man Needs A Maid" it tries to replace the unsuccessful effects that are prevalent within the song. It is a weak song and the uneventful attempt to put some life into it only manages to beat the dead horse even more.

"The Needle and the Damage Done" is a song with a message. "It's a kind of a serious song about some people that I know, some people you know, and some people that neither one of us knows. It's about heroin addiction. And somewhere in the universe there's probably a place where all of the great artists that didn't get out, sort of a museum of incredible art that never got out because of heroin. It's probably somewhere."

"The Needle and the Damage Done" is a live cut, the only one on the album, that was recorded at a gig at UCLA. Noteworthy is the jump splice from the applause into the thundering beginning of "Words/(Between the Lines Of Age)".

"Words" tries so hard to be like its heavy, electric predecessors such as "Southern Man", "Down By the River" and "I've Been Waiting For You". There is a nice time change, from four-four to three-four, with a beat lost somehow during the transition, but it does little for this otherwise mediocre sons. All the smoke generated by the musicians seems forced, and the song ultimately goes nowhere. Hopefully, Crosby, Stills, Nash and Young will be able to augment it in live performances.

The same, therefore, has got to be true for "Alabama" because this is such an obviously blatant attempt to recreate "Southern Man" that it is embarrassing. "Alabama" will turn out to be a song that Neil Young will wish he had never written.

Unfortunately, half good and half bad isn't anywhere good enough. What is even more unpleasant is that the songs that don't make it are an attempt to recreate something that has already happened. Rather than to experiment with the talen of song writing, Neil Young instead has been regressing. Harvest, clad in a rustic album cover, with lyrics on genuine parchment, fails to distinguish between antiquity and repition. If there's a less to be learned by Harvest, Bob Dylan learned it some time ago; "Don't look back".

Jim Messina Quietly Returns

By KENNETH SULIN

"Sittin In" -- Kenny Loggins and Jim Messina Columbia Records

In the early fall of 1971 Jim Messina, with little in the way of notification or reason, suddenly decided to call it quits with Poco. Where did he go? And what paths did he follow since his all but abrupt divorce from the group? The tale goes as this: Messina found himself in a rut with Poco, especially on tour and abroad. Consequently he choose to moor himself away from the group and become nothing but a mere studio musician. Touring, evidently, had become more than he could handle; while his positive attitudes toward concert performances dwindled to obscurity. This tendency of tediously putting up with concert touring plagued other fine musicians--Nicky Hopkins, Peter Green just to name a few--so the case of Messina was not a rare one. Although he'd left Poco, one could be sure his name would pop up again sooner or later and so it has.

"Sittin In" is a new Columbia release featuring song-writer Kenny Loggins and, naturally, one James Messina. The record can be nothing but a lazy addition to the over-saturated volumes of country music, sorry to say. This is Loggins' album and Messina, playing his new role of studio musician, is featured here primarily to give Loggins a boost, rather a helping hand to a spot of public recognition. However large that boost may be is certainly pending since the album itself by no means salutes Messina at his best.

Kenny Loggins is virtually unknown as far as popular music goes. Perhaps his one and only claim to fame was as a songwriter producing unnoticed compositions for the Nitty Gritty Dirt Band; otherwise, his name has seldom been heard.

The record has undoubtly reproduced a breeze of the Poco sound only with a calmer base and more serene, gentle tone. Messina is obviously responsible for the main guitar progressions and leads while Loggins contributes with a second guitar and nearly all the vocal work. The individual selections are of the mellower sense, very light, very quiet and often sleepy or timid sounding. Unfortunately, they lack expression, not that each song is stagnant, just that the melodies and rythms become more or less unnoticeable so that you'll have no harmony remaining with your thoughts after the tune's completion.

Along with the two guitars, keyboards, bass, horns, and drums provide the almost negligent backing music. Messina and Loggins have, however, combined in some excellent harmonies which, again, issue a wave of calmness and serenity. Messina performs both with electric and acoustic guitars; while Loggins fiddles usually with the acoustic. "Fiddles" may well be a poor choice of words since Loggins himself is a fair guitarist, but hardly a master as a musician.

As for the individual tracks we are offered an array of so-called American Heritage type selections. In other words homey tunes of the purest sense that reek of country airiness--something they would like to deny is involved here.

Only once on a particular cut entitled "Vahevella," the pattern changes to a semi-Latin American tone. The song is terribly unauthentic and on first hearing it one would imagine seeing Chiquita Banana pracing across stage with a headdress of gayly colored fruit.

Messina, as expected, was the producer of the album; nevertheless, his individual talent is by large sliding and may well eventually slope downward in the future. This may be the way he wants it, just sitting back and finally enjoying his work rather than foreseeing the thankless job of actual concert performances. It's a strange thing however; most work for years in the studio before they're able to make it on their own. Messina, on the other hand, reversed tracks and has directed himself on an opposite road.

Again the selections are sweet, but no catchy tunes make the record admirable. The best suggestion would be to listen at a low volume in order to keep from hearing Columbia's hazy tones which is brought out on a good number of their albums. The songs are not drawn out, but the record exhibits no fancy guitar playing; accented by its use of usual chords and simple arrangements. There seems to be a minimum of impressive work done here, and you can categorize the album as "typical middle-of-the-road."

"Sittin In", although perspectively it's Loggins' album, must be Messina's as well. Sadly it will become just another in the long line of folksy records sparsely peppered with country flavor, seldom moving and far from enthralling.

Messina in suspenders, Loggins behind the wheel.

A Sound That Was Not Heard

By GARY GOMES

Although I am but a paltry reviewer of records in this great universe of ours, allow me a bit of philosophy about sounds and your relationship to them.

By now you must surely be aware of the idea that if there is a noise made in a forest, and no one is around to here it, then it has never existed (because there is no one to report its existence). The same theorem applies to music, and there is an added risk here--if that sound is finally discovered, and the sound is unfamiliar, then it will be categorically rejected (the old rule of "that which is alien to a life form is automatically rejected)". And then, if you disappear for any extended period of time, people automatically assume that you have stopped functioning ("Whatever happened to so-and-so?"). The thing, dear friends, is to keep the image in the public eye, and if that image is not commercially successful, to shuck aside the image or the product. As soon as you realize that what you listen to is determined by a bunch of admen in New York, and that your personal taste is chosen for you, the better off you'll be.

Family has suffered from the above afflictions for quite some time now. First, they were cursed with having a very strange lead singer in the form of Roger Chapman, whose voice comes out somewhere between that of Cat Stevens' and a stray goat's, they were stranded by the wayside when Ric Grech left to help form Blind Faith, and "Fearless" is their first album to be released in the U.S. in almost two years. It might take Family a considerable amount of time to catch up, if this is a comeback for them in the States.

At first listening, Family might seem to be just another rock group with a strange lead singer. Close listening will reveal more and more as you go along. You know it's there, but you can't quite put your finger on it right away-then you hear it, as if each part were a well-crafted work of precision and timing, each instrument chosen to convey a unique listening mood.

All the members of the group are surpassing musicians, with Chapman's bizarre voice leading the way. Poli Palmer's solos on vibes are unique and interesting, John Whitney, the guitarist of the group, is very able, but it is his use of acoustic guitar and mandolin within the context of a highly amplified unit that makes Family somewhat unusual. John Wetton helps Palmer with keyboard and electronic duties on the album, provides filler for Whitney's guitar work, and his smooth, clear vocalizing acts as a good foil for Chapman's often fierce and thick voice. Rob Townsend, the drummer, while not virtuosic in technique, has unique ideas that help round out the group. If he were substituted, you'd know it.

Perhaps Family's main strength, however, is their lyrics. They are excellent for imagery and for fitting the mood of the songs, while they interact with, and don't overshadow, the musical ventures of the group.

"Between Blue and Me", the opener of the album, starts off slowly and subtly, like the reminiscence it is intended to convey. The song builds in intensity until it becomes a reality to the teller of the tale, filled with anguish, and then gradually drifts back into a fond remembrance. "Sat'dy Barfly" is self-descriptive and sly. The young bon vivant, stopping in at his local bar on a Saturday night, living it up with his favorite girl. The French horn in the song gives it a comical air, and Chapman treats the lyrics with a snide attitude, backed by a barrelhouse piano, and ends the song with the male chauvinist remark "Whose place Louise, yours or mine?"

The group moves next to a jazz-like chant, "Lark and Sing," written by Poli Palmer, who might prove to be as good a lyricist for the group as Chapman. Excellent group harmonies and a sad but bouncy beat characterize this piece. Here Chapman nearly whispers the lyrics, all the raspiness of his voice gone. The lyrics tell of the strain of a long-suffered life, but the inevitable triumph is expressed: "Losing sometimes means you win, if you let the true you thru..."

The next cut "Spanish Tide" starts off with a gentle harpsichord backing, and moves through unorthodox chord changes into a Spanish mode, a short electric guitar solo, and Wetton offering his vocal services, first alone, then with Chapman. A fine vibes solo by Palmer carries it along, until it falls back into its original setting leading the song out.

"Save Some for Thee" seems to be a joyful song, with bouncy horns. However, the mournful lyrics belie this--better times are coming.

"Side two starts off with the most adventurous thing that Family has ever done, "Take your Partner". The song begins with bizarre electronics over a funky rhythm, sliding organ, going into Chapman's already strange voice, which is electronically modified on this track, and the voice leads into some advanced chording by the guitarists, which then moves into a rather straight-sounding guitar solo by Whitney, backed by brass (the Ladbroke Horns) and then moves back into Chapman's vocal (extremely odd timing), and the electronic effects are brought in by a Moog this time. Excellent.

"Children" follows shortly thereafter, backed by Chapman's acoustic guitar playing, and the song has a bit of a John Sebastian flavour to it. "Crinkly Grin", a little gem about a minute long, follows, and this gives Palmer a chance to show off his talents on electronic vibraphone. From his playing, I would venture a guess that the multi-instrumentalist (he also plays flute, keyboards, and percussion) has picked up on some of Gary Burton's work on that instrument ("Vibrafinger" on "Good Vibes", for example.).

The next piece, "Blind" is beautiful in an eerie sort of way. It gives the feel of a sailor's chant, in heavily pronounced 6/8 time, starting with an eerie sound from the organ (Somewhat like the organ shriek on "America from the Nice's "Elegy" album). The piece is accentuated by Whitney's slide guitar work. Then an excellent solo on either musette (a relative of the bagpipes) or violin- I can't yet determine which-ensues, and the song fades out. It is Chapman at his most volatile on this track, in searing voice from beginning to end.

The album ends with "Burning Bridges", a song of despair on which Chapman uses a Kustom "Bag" to make his voice sound like an organ. Whitney does a superb job on mandolin here, adding to the mournful quality of the piece.

Whether this album provides Family's long overdue breakthrough into popularity in the United States remains to be seen. They really don't need it, and have stopped making American tours, because, as one of the members of the group has said, "I guess we're too far out for the States." They continue to finish near the top of the Melody Maker poll consistently, and are earning about 20 to 30 thousand pounds a month touring Europe. The American release seems to be a mere formality, and it would be foolish of them to attempt another financially serious tour of the States, especially considering their immense popularity in England, and even more so if it meant risking the quality of their music, which would seem to be a necessity for success here. Family, take heed of Poli Palmer's lyrics on "Larf and Sing": "Losing Sometimes means you win, if you let the true you thru." It doesn't seem as though Family are going to stop letting their "true you" show.

"This album is dedicated to all the people who have pulled strokes for or against us, for they shall be called fearless" reads the back of the album cover. But, in the lower right hand corner there is a little rabbitlike creature uttering the words "Daft I call it." So do I.

Emotionally Staggering Anti-War Film

By MARY LOU GORDON

adapted for the screen and directed by Dalton Trumbo, from his novel; starring Timothy Bottoms, Diane Varsi, Jason Robards and Donald Sutherland.

Johnny Got His Gun is a thematically awesome and emotionally staggering anti-war film that presents the atrocities of war in the form of a young injured soldier and the fate that war and cruel circumstance have prescribed for him. Joe is left armless, legless and partially faceless, a broken shell of a man who, according to hospital diagnosis is no more than a vegetable, a mutilated torso that breathes, but has lost all possible control of his mental faculties of thought by extensive brain damage. The pathos and tragedy of the film lie in the fact Joe is mentally alive, but due to his physical limitations he cannot communicate the existence of his thoughts or feelings beyond the limits of his own mind.

Joe is deaf as well as sightless and mute, and he lives in a hellish nightmare of dark confusion as to what has happened to him, and he is not even aware of the extent of his physical damage. All that he can realize is that he is in a hospital and for some reason the doctors have amputated his arms and legs. He cannot plead for mercy or cry for help - all he can do is lie in his bed and exist as a freak of medical history whose existence consists of being a model for observation and tests that might open new doors of medical aid for other badly injured soldiers.

In Joe's terrifying world, he has only memories and fantasies to live on - he has no real concept of his present reality, and in his dreams he begins to confuse his past experiences with his present situation. He imagines circumstances where he prophetically sees himself as being armless and legless, and he gradually begins to confuse different time sequences in his past, until his memories become fantastically surreal.

Joe is kept locked and hidden away in a remote utility room of the hospital, where the windows are shut so that no one will look in and discover him. He is given virtually no attention and the only time anyone enters his room is to see if he is still breathing or to hook him up to his food bottle. Joe gradually learns to recognize the entrance of people by the vibrations he feels when the door opens and they walk towards him, and when he tries to signal his awareness of them by tossing his head about the pillow, he finds that they think his muscles are having a spasm, and they sedate him.

Joe is given a minute piece of happiness by an old nurse, who orders the windows opened and the body moved into the sunlight. The sunlight becomes something wonderful to Joe, and by its warmth he can tell day from night and gain a small grip on time from which he can keep track of the passage of days and weeks.

The only person in the hospital who feels any compassion or shows any real kindness towards Joe is a young nurse, played by Diane Varsi. She is the only person empathetic enough to come near to Joe out of humaneness and not for obligatory, clinical purposes. She alone realizes the possibility that this medical curiosity might be mentally alive and in need of understanding and love. She strokes his head, kisses his forehead and even manually takes care of his sexual needs. At one point she spells out Merry Christmas to Joe on his chest, and as he frantically shakes his head about, they realize that they can communicate to each other.

Near the end of the film, Joe begins tapping morse code to the nurse, and she realizes you want us to do for you?" on his forehead, and he tells them to either kill him or put him in a carnival side show. The realization that Joe has been mentally alive for the past year shocks the staff into incredulity, but at the same time they show no real sympathy for his situation. When they leave, the nurse blocks off Joe's air tube, but is stopped from fulfilling his wish by an officer who stops her before Joe is dead. The end of the film comes with Joe's final statement on his situation, where he expresses deep anger and hatred for the people who are responsible for his situation, along with the bitter resignation that he can't even do anything to help himself because he doesn't even have the "arms to kill himself or the legs to walk away." The scene fades with Joe's quietly calling out an SOS to the world that rings inaudibly to an empty room.

Johnny Got His Gun is a powerfully monumental film that carries us along in the wake of it's shocking story in a mixed state of horror, anger, fright, sadness and bitterness. The acting in the film is extremely well done -- Timothy Bottoms, who plays Joe, is shown in his memories as a very sweet and frightened young man who doesn't want to go to war, but has no choice, and he effects this personification perfectly. As the voice of Joe in the hospital, he has done a most effective job of presenting deeply personal soliquies that are laced with fears and emotions far removed from what the average person experiences in his lifetime. Diane Varsi portrays the compassionate nurse with a strength of emotional control that becomes a highly creditable piece of acting. Her sensitivity to Joe is handled with a poignancy that makes her as helpless in her concern for Joe in the face of the higher medical eschalon as Joe himself is. Jason Robards plays Joe's father, who in flashbacks to Joe's childhood, is the voice of true America in his righteous belief of a young man's duty to the military. When confronted by young Joe with the question of will he make him go to war, Robards answers, "For democracy, any man would gladly give his only begotten son." Robards plays a man who realizes the terrible fate awaiting his son, but feels that his son cannot prove himself as a man unless he willingly goes to war, and Robards adapts himself to this lovingly cruel stance with all the great powers of acting that he is capable of.

Trumbo has used the full potential of photography to create emotional levels that that suspend us in a taut line between colorful expressions, memories and impressions of life, and the black and white realities of the anesthetic utility room. Trumbo works with the contrasting features of color and black and white to his utmost advantage, and through the photography the mood fluxuates between establishing a sense of living warmth and vitality and a deadened chill of sterile and vacuous despondency. The editing is rough and abrupt in the earlier stages of the film, but as it progresses, the transitions are made with a flawless control and proceed in a rapidly changing flow that is consistent with Joe's quick train of thoughts.

The sense of victimization with which this story is expressed is coupled with such a strongly eminating feeling of hopelessness that the incredible fate of Joe becomes a reality whose dimensions are almost too large to grasp. The impact of this film is paralyzing, and the power it contains lies in its ability to chip savagely at our emotions and sensabilities by presenting the heinous situation of a boy who stands as the ultimate symbol of all men who have been unjustly defiled by war. The film is a horrifying testament to the violations of human rights and dignity that war imposes, and on the callous apathy that develops in medical personnel in times of war towards the individual. Dalton Trumbo has created a film from his novel out of a need to visually expose a shameful truth of war, and the film is one whose anquishing realization will not easily be forgotten.

Glorified Homocidial Depravity

By PATRICK SULLIVAN

Dirty Harry seeks to entertain us with a medieval world of sin. It is not the actual physical violence of the film that is indicative of this sense of sin but the way in which humanity at large and individuals in particular are perceived. The film works in a skillful and sustained manner to make the audience take special pleasure in this pervasive sense of depravity. It goes unchallenged, even unqualified: when the police chief says "There are no animals out there," the audience along with Harry look past him implacably to the irredeemable depravity of the killer at large who will either kill or be killed.

The police chief stands there benevolent and even paternal, but as the film shows he is more a politician now than a law enforcement officer. And the film wants us to feel if not really understand that law enforcement has some very real problems with the likes of the Escabado and Miranda decisions. The trouble with this easy antiliberalism is that its own test-case is one of glorified sado-masochistic homicidal depravity. To attempt any valid comment on legal protections afforded defendants under recent Supreme Court rulings with this case at hand is not to be serious-minded in the first place and to play with several audience fears and fantasies as well.

So the film leaves me with more than a bad taste in my mouth. I am distressed as well with the rampant popularity of the film. The tide of popular taste ebbs and flows, and the likes of Dirty Harry may not find a market again. But I can't feel that optimistic or resigned. This film moves with a brilliance of pace and photography which makes its several messages all the more insidious. Moreover, small children in Amherst, Massachusetts walk down the street to see a billboard read "Dirty Harry - back by popular demand". Their look of marvel and excitement should make us wonder if the new gladiators in the coliseums of our cinemas are not dangerous sport indeed. Then too, these days any film coming back "by popular demand" is worthy of note.

It is a fact that after the assassination of John Kennedy the film The Manchurian Candidate was removed from circulation. It is a fact that the 1930's film M explored society's complexity in the frightening, murderous compulsions of the child killer. It is a fact that in Kurosawa's Seven Samarai the violence is presented in the manner which guarantees the audience's awareness of its horror, its barbarity, its basic ingloriousness. And it is a fact that next to any of these three films Dirty Harry appears cheap and diseased.

But this harsh response will ring true only if one does not accept several of the film's premises, premises which allow the film to operate on its own simplistic logic. The first of these premises concerns the inevitability of fire-arms themselves. The film shows how our society is capable of being terrorized by a homicidal killer. In the face of loop-holes in the law and an increasingly permissive political climate, the killer is all the more free to orchestrate his bloody circus of death on that society. In presenting such a phenomenon to be more than possible, the film indirectly testifies to the need for severe gun control legislation, which would cut into the likelihood of such nightmares occurring. But the film also directly testifies to the unlikelihood of such action being taken at this time. For the film throws it support instead to the legitimacy of meeting fire with fire. In the exchange between Harry and the Mayor in his office, Harry speaks of shooting a rapist charging his victim: he says he shoots when he sees a man attacking a woman with a butcher knife. The implication is that he shoots to kill. And a further implication is that if he doesn't have the approval of the law, he has the approval of the society.

We are back to Harry's fundamental assumption that you must deal violently with appetite for pornography and an appetite for violent acts, so there may be a similar dissociation between an appetite for violent films of one kind or another and a societal tendency in actuality to endorse or even celebrate such acts of violence. In other words, what's the fuss? Movie critics like Paul Zimmerman endorse the idea that man needs rights of violent acts. The possibility that you disarm violent actors, that society finds ways to control, even to help its destructive members is simply a possibility never allowed to be considered in this film. The case of the homicidal Zodiac killer allows the film-maker to generalize about contemporary society and its condition in ways which are irresponsible and even malicious. The film will indicate that Harry was reprimanded for shooting the man attempting rape, that he acted extra-legally. But it will everywhere support the idea that Harry is essentially right. And in doing that, the film breeds its own sense of futility and chaos exemplified by Harry himself in the final minutes of the film when he removes his police inspector's badge and tosses it into the briny water where the killer floats. Is it here suggested that Harry really doesn't want anymore of this carnage, that he is finally sickened by his life and what he must do? The film, judging by its popularity has not reinforced those feelings in us the audience, however. More than likely, too, Harry leaves the force for other reasons as well.

On the other hand, do films like Dirty Harry really have these social, political, and ethical implications I assume they do in such a case as this? Do audiences seeing such a film really succumb to the covert kinds of teaching that are suggested? A counter argument might be made that in fact Dirty Harry represents another aspect of the pornographic movie. Instead of nudity et al, the film "turns people on" by its various forms of pronographic violence and identification with the killer. With literature anyway there seems to be a tenuous relationship between an violence and film maker Stanley Kubrick insists that in cinematic fantasies such as A Clockwork Orange the audience has a chance to play with its subconscious and ventilate in a harmless form its appetites. Taken to its extreme, this argument would suggest that there is no relationship between the visions of art and the real world where people actually act out their lives. Still with Dirty Harry there are clear connections to be made between the values the film glamorizes (which is quite different from exploring fantasies) and operating national characteristics which, riddled with fantasy though they be, have a strong life of their own and continue to generate beliefs and behavior we must face down, and change:

> A Marlboro man who doesn't smoke? The heir of Daniel Boone and Davy Crockett, Honest Abe and General Lee, the builder, tinkerer, woodsman, cowboy, athlete. The muscular Christian (without knowing it); the Lone Ranger, Jack Armstrong, Captain Midnight, frank yet cautious, shrewd yet credulous, positive yet skeptical, confident yet shy. Physically a fine man,.. The qualities of his character and country were fused and confused in a mixture of "history", mythology and fact which makes the separate elements indistinguishable.

The governing metaphor in drama as well as in life is that all the world is a stage, and we are players on it. And the stage in Dirty Harry is supposedly not a fantasy one: we follow Harry into the Mayor's chambers, we travel in helicopters around San Francisco, we witness nervously the District Attorney haranguing Harry for his illegal entry to the killer's room. The crisp, realistic film style portrays the real world supposedly on its own terms. Then again, scenes like that before the huge cross on Mt. Davidson, the vicious beating of both Harry and the killer at different points in the film, the various episodes of shooting have about them a kind of numbed impact, a stylized quality that does not make the audience flinch or recoil as "realistic" portraits of violence do.

The principle reason for this is because we know the sources of the violence: the violence issues either from the bad and ugly killer or from the good invincible revenge figure who is Harry. In a world, then, which is generally ugly and a world in which the good and the bad are pictured in distinct and opposite roles, it is quite easy for an audience to be comfortable with violence. The society may have collectively given up a shared belief in an after-life of hell, but in a film like Dirty Harry the related belief in fundamental human depravity is a necessary ingredient. And as long as the film leaves that belief unquestioned, the necessary killing of the killer can go unchallenged. The film is quite successful in keeping the viewer's attention away from other points of view. For instance, in case the viewer midway through the film develops any more complicated response to the actions of the killer, the film provides the easiest means of condemning him as unhuman scum: he captures a fourteen year old girl and in the police chambers articles of her underclothing are exhibited. A quick, obvious, and crude response to criminal acts of a sexual nature insure that the killer will remain a simple object of violence. And therefore the melodramatic appetite for terror can be uncomplicated by such emotions as sympathy or efforts of analysis.

The same distance from identification and sympathy is scarcely withheld from the protagonist however. The film shows Harry comfortable with violence, and even eager for it on occasion. But we learn that he lost his wife at the hands of a drunken driver. And the film works hard to convince us that Harry is fundamentally concerned about individual human beings like the kidnapped girl when police officials, the Mayor, and others are fundamentally protecting their image within a more abstract kind of social order. In the climatic scene, Harry's single expression of defeat turns out in fact to be an expression of anxious decision making as he chooses to fire his gun at a time of maximum risk. So if Harry is ostensibly callous, in fact the film supports at every turn the fact that in reality he is not, that he is actually a highly emotional, complicated, and suffering individual.

Those qualities are secondary to the chief quality he displays, however: his ability to act. His superheroic stature is due primarily to this facet of his character (he has a monotonously wooden personality): he doesn't retreat, vacillate, intellectualize, or in general complicate a situation. He acts in a direct and usually violent manner, but his chief virtue here, his "charisma", is his effectiveness. To his superiors he angrily asks, "When are you going to start dealing with. . .?"

Here lies Harry's magnetism, and the chief reason, I think for the film's popularity. His pugnaciousness, intollerance, cynicism enables him to live within a charmed circle of speedy effectiveness. It is precisely in the way in which he avoids all the more messsy, problematic responses to experience that he buys the audience's allegiance. The society outside the movie theater with its complexity, frustration, lack of simple and direct answers to its problems weighs heavily on the audience's minds. In the light of such a burden the almost magical life of the violent modern warrior can seem to exercise these demons of ineffectuality, confusion, and frustration which are so much a part of our contemporary sensibility.

But how much is exorcism and how much is reinforcement? This is no urban cop thriller in the style of The French Connection. There's no way one can see John Wayne's shadow around Paddy Doyle. But is it not a fact that the mould in which Harry is cast resembles astonishingly well the likes of John Wayne, the super machismo Western hero figure. And Harry, like John Wayne, insistently reviles the complexities of modern urban life forcing changes in behavior and attitude unthinkable in a world where the good and the bad are still clear and distinct - and quite vicious - ideas. Few western heroes possess the grimness and the antisocial features of Harry the cop. On the other hand, Harry's disgust at the demise of the old west standards plays the major part in his throwing away his badge. And the movie as a whole makes us feel that the world loses something in closing the frontier to the likes of Harry, who alone was really a man, really in charge. Such self-deceiving, destructive images of manhood we scarcely need, can scarcely afford any longer.

Loudspeakers - Part Two

By FRANK JOHNSON

Last time we looked at the components of a loudspeaker system and how these devices work. Today we'll turn to the measuring aspects of speakers, for this is how they are evaluated.

The wide variety of loudspeaker systems on the market today means that people are willing to buy quite a lot of different-sounding speakers. This in itself introduces a problem with speaker testing, because if everyone agreed as to how a speaker should sound, the matter would be simple. Unfortunately, the many different designs and types of speakers dictate a myriad of good-quality devices and that means we have to bend a little in our opinions of how a speaker should "sound" and realize that hi-fi, as I have maintained throughout these issues, is a very subjective art. Probably no where is there greater likelihood of subjective appreciation than in a loudspeaker, because although most speakers are constructed according to the same principle, very few sound quite the same.

With this premise in mind, we will turn to an example of one loudspeaker design that is quite a departure from the ordinary. The speaker in question, which is designed to radiate in a non-omnidirectional speaker; these types have become rather popular in the last few years. Basically the individual woofers and tweeters in these systems are virtually identical to those used in other designs, except for the fact that they are positioned so that the sound is directed into some sort of a reflector, or else a bulk of the sound reaches the listener indirectly by being bounced off the wall first. Lacking any specific criteria for these "omni" designs, we can call the first type "passive reflective", because the reflection principle is self-contained in the system, and the second variety "active reflective", because it requires placement in front of a wall to do the job.

The sound from both types of omnidirectional speakers, when operated in stereo, tends to be rather spacious and exciting. These speakers build up a stereo image with a minimum of difficulty, and although room location is critical with the active type, general location in the listening environment does not have to be anywhere in particular. If the components in these systems are made well, they should be no less satisfactory than conventional designs'. The drawbacks to "omni" sound concern a rather exaggerated spatial perspective and a somewhat uneven overall frequency response. This is due to several factors, one of them being ipso facto: reflected sound cannot rival direct sound for purity and clarity because high frequencies follow a very narrow axis and if they are beamed around a reflector, they will sound unnatural. A good many omni designs do not have a smooth overall frequency response; whether this is due to inherently non-liner components is difficult to ascertain, but it seems to be a problem in general. The opinion of this writer is that because most sound is unreflected to begin with, these designs should be avoided, especially if they suffer from an unnatural frequency response. If accuracy in your listening is any criteria, you would be far better off with conventional designs, particularly if you listening concerns classical music or master taping- two choices demanding the utmost accuracy.

We said in previous issues that an amplifier is most efficient in the midrange frequencies, and this efficiency drops off a frequency extremes. A loudspeaker has a similar problem reproducing these extremes, and although the problem is alleviated somewhat by using a separate woofer and tweeter for the bass and the treble (or a midrange in between), some woofers do a better job than others. Bass frequencies in particular are difficult to reproduce; the woofer has to be relatively large and it must also have a compliant surround (see previous article) to push the massive air volumes that accompany bass. As volume increases, the woofer has to move even more air, and to meet the demand for high volume bass, it usually does two things: it begins to distort somewhat, and it gets less efficient, demanding a great deal of power from the amplifier. If the amplifier is very high-powered to begin with, and the speaker is efficient, there is a risk of damaging the speaker. This is why many speaker systems are fused when used in conjunction with super-power amplifiers. A "super-power" amplifier includes those amplifiers which put out in excess of 60watts/channel RMS, and they are becoming quite common nowadays in the race for the "perfect" amplifier.

Many speakers have specifications which indicate their ultimate power handling ability, but many of these are inaccurate and tend to also confuse the buyer. Theoretically, a speaker is "rated" at a certain wattage before which it will deliver rated acoustic output at relatively low distortion levels, also, it will be safe when used with amplifiers whose power output falls below this figure. If a given speaker is rated at "50 watts power handling ability", the specification should mean that it might be unsafe to use the speaker with a 90-watt amplifier but that perfectly satisfactory results might be obtained with a 40-watt amp. I say "might" because the ratings vary from speaker to speaker, and also amp to amp. A rule of the thumb would be to know for sure the ultimate power output of the amplifier (via the convenient RMS indicator) before selecting a speaker, regardless of the wattage ratings of the speaker. Because many acoustic-suspension speakers need at leat 20-25 watts RMS even to drive them, they may need about 4 times that amount to work at the required transient level, and because of their inherent inefficiency they will not be damaged by these transients. Keep in mind that in many cases where a speaker is "burnt out" by an amplifier the fault lay in an accidental cause such as dropping the phono tone arm with the volume turned up very high, or else the speaker was very efficient and used in conjunction with a superpower amp, a potentially hazardous combination.

Most readers probably realize that the size of the woofer will give a rough indication of how well it will perform with a very low bass. By and large this is quite true, but one should not turn away from all smaller woofers because many of them are designed to reproduce even very low bass despite their small size. The term "small" includes 8" woofers and smaller; the term "large" indicates 10" woofers and larger. A large speaker cone can move more air, to be sure, but if a smaller cone has a flexible surround so that it is "compliant" (moving very easily), both speakers may well move the same amount of air and be equally as efficient in the low bass frequencies.

On the other hand, tweeters should be constructed rather small. High frequencies have a very short wavelength, and a speaker reproducing the higher notes won't move very much air but the sound will be very localized at the areas on the cone that vibrate. Smaller cones handle these high frequencies better than larger ones. Although woofer sized should be at least 8" or larger for low bass reproduction, tweeters should be at least 2-1/2" or smaller to handle the treble.

When speakers are measured in the laboratory, some means of indicating the overall frequency response is desired. To find this out accurately, the speaker is placed in an environment free of any extraneous resonances (an anechoic chamber is best for this) and a microphone selected for a very wide and smooth frequency response is employed; capacitor microphones usually fulfill this requirement. Two other pieces of equipment are essential: a signal or audio generator capable of reproducing very pure sine-wave tones is fed into the speaker, and an accurate volume-unit (VU) meter is connected to the microphone. During a "sweep", when the tones vary from the lowest to the highest frequencies, the meter will indicate when the speaker's response is not smoothe or linear. For a very accurate graph of the speaker's response, some labs use an automatic graph directly connected to the signal generator. If the microphone's response is perfectly flat, and the speaker's performance is rough and uneven, then we know that the system suffers from spurious resonances which will add an unnatural character to the sound. Other testing methods include the occasionally-used "tone bursts", sudden peaks at different frequencies which are viewed with an oscilloscope. Tone burst displays which indicate some "ringing" or continuation at the end of the burst generally mean that the speaker's response is uneven and that the woofer or tweeter is not properly damped.

But a logical question should arise at this point from readers who neither have laboratory test equipment nor care about the ultimate results: how can tests be made with the most important piece of equipment- the ear? I propose four simple but important test that can be made in any audio showroom. Most dealers will demonstrate their speakers by cranking up the volume and switching the input from speaker to speaker- a technique know as "A-B'ing". This compares one speaker's sound from another, but if the sound is unnatural to begin with (amplified music is an example) or else the speakers in question are unnatural, this method doesn't indicate ultimate quality very

Instead, use any or all of these tests. Remember that overall bass and treble response should be smooth. To ascertain smooth bass output, locate an FM station which is broadcasting an announcer's voice. It should come in tonefully but not harsh or overemphasized. If the announcer's voice sounds perhaps a bit too deep and resonant, it may indicate a peak in the 100-cycle region which can give a boomy or uneven "Juke-box" quality, anathema to true high fidelity. After this, locate a pure organ tone in the low bass. The opening to "Also Sprach Zarathustra" by Richard Strauss is a well-known example; others such as "Lieutenant Kije Suite-Troika" (Prodoviev) and Saint-Seans Symphony No. 3 for Organ are not so well-know but equally useful. The speaker that does the best on these low organ notes will be excellent for true low bass.

To evaluate treble response, de-tune an FM station to the interstation noise and hiss between channels. It should sound like a soft rush, not a harsh hiss which means peaky treble. For music tests, select stringed instruments such as violins in an orchestra. They should sound soft and airy, not shrill or squeaky. Specifically, the "Lieutenant Kije- Troika" is excellent for this; other symphonies which include a triangel, bells, harpsicord or solo violin also show off a good (or bad) tweeter.

Thirdly, bring along a well-know record or tape for your listening. You will know how the disc sounds or at least should sound, and the speaker which does the best job is the one for you. This example perhaps best illustrates the term "Subjective appeal", for no method of lab testing will tell you how music should sound. A very exacting test is to directly compare a speaker to a live music source such as a piano or a concert. Attend one before you do your speaker shopping.

Finally, purchase one of the several excellent audio test records available from CBS labs or Stereo-Review. Besides a very comprehensive check of other equipment, speaker evaluation is also featured by a thorough series of sweep tones and test reference frequencies. It's like having many of the facilities of a testing lab without the cost or the complicated equipment. But know your ears before you test your speakers- if you can't hear notes above 16 kHz. because you're 40 or older, don't blame it on the speaker- blame it on Father Time, because gradual treble loss is function of old age.

After your shopping is done, make sure you know how to place speakers in a room for the best effect. Remember the simple rule that speakers sound best when placed along reflecting surfaces (not in front of them). Speakers located near the floor or the ceiling have better bass response than those placed in the center of the room. Put your speakers near the floor and against (but not touching) the wall for more bass. The most bass is produced when speakers are located in a corner, but too much bass might be produced in this case; another problem arises from a general lack of convenient corners for this purpose and also a potential loss of stereo image from an extended spread. Keeping these thoughts in mind, select the area in the listening room that gives the best overall result-this however may not be the most aesthetically-pleasing location, so compromise a little.

On the basis of the high cost of individual speaker components these days, plus the problems of optimized design and testing, I don't recommend that you buy speakers "in the raw" and install them in your own speaker systems. Most manufacturers have very fine testing procedures that optimize each system before it leaves the factory; you probably will be unable to duplicate these tests yourself. Although carentry can be a lot of fun for those who are good at it, it can be a dreadful nuisance for those who are not (myself included!), and without a well-equipped workshop, it is a major problem. Buy speakers already enclosed in systems if you want to insure your getting the best quality for your money, unless you're confirmed tinkerer who enjoys designing his own enclosures and working with wood.

Two final notes: first, many speaker systems come equipped with treble adjustment controls on the back of the cabinet. I will discuss these controls fully in a later issue, but let it suffice- for now- to say that they should be left in their "normal" settings, obviously, when listening to speakers in a store. If one system has these controls turned up, and another system has them turned down, the second system may have apparently less treble than the former. Unscrupulous salesmen fool around with these controls when they want to sell their own brand and not someone else's. Treble controls may be useful when you want to cope with room response variations, but my opinion tends toward leaving them either at the "maximum" settings or the "normal" settings, depending on the room, the speaker, and the listener.

Also, for those of you who caught my mistake in the last issue concerning crossover networks, my apologies. I stated that a choke blocks low frequencies and a capacitor blocks high frequencies. It should be the other way around.

The Magnificent Seven (Sunday, Student Union Ballroom, 7)

John Sturges' Americanized version of the classic Japanese film The Seven Samuari and an extremely odd, yet often beautiful and effective Western. The film transfers the plot of that Japanese classic to a Western setting, keeping the plot intact. The story concerns a group of mercenaries who defend a village from plundering of bandits. The film is extremely well-cast, with Eli Wallach as the villainous Mexican, and Yul Brynner, Charles Bronson, Steve McQueen, and Robert Vaughn as some of the mercenaries. Sturges' direction often borders of the off-beat, but is beautifully photographed and equally finely scored with memorable music by Elmer Bernstein.

Monkey Business (Monday, Student Union Ballroom, 7 and 8:30)

The Marx Brothers, once again, in another vintage comedy from the Thirties.

Mr. Smith Goes To Washington (Friday, Merrill Science Center, 7:30 and 10)

Perhaps the finest crafter social comedies of the Thirties which manages a particularly strong message while being thoroughly entertaining. The film concerns an idealistic young Senator from Wisconsin who stands against a good-natured humor and the character of Mr. Smith, and the film itself are irresistible. James Stewart won the NY Film Critics award of 1939 as Best Actor, and he is ably supported by Jean Arthur, Claude Rains, Guy Kibbee, and Thomas Mitchell.

My Little Chickadee (Saturday, SU Ballroom, 7 and 9)

The teaming of W.C. Fields and Mae West made for a rather disappointing match and a startling unfunny Western satire. The story concerns a wanton wench played by Mae West who hooks an unsuspecting shlump, played by Fields, as protection in a western town. The humor is often flat and the chemistry between Fields and West doesn't quite cohese.

Objective:Burma (Friday, Blue Wall Rathskellar, 8)

How Erol Flynn won the Second World War single-handedly without little assistance from the British, who spited Hollywood by refusing to show the film in England.

The Petrified Forest (Jerry Lewis Cinema, Northampton)

Starring Leslie Howard, Humphrey Bogart and Bette Davis, this 1936 classic is a take-off on Robert Sherwood's play of a man, held captive in a remote inn by a gangster, who gives his life to save the other hostages. Directed by Archie Mayo, the best feature of this film is the acting.

Pocket Money (Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)

A boring and worthless film, whose semblance of a plot deals with cattle ranchers in the guise of Paul Newman, Lee Marvin and Strother Martin. The action is slow and directionless, for the most part, with Newman taking a dry and uncreative role. Lee Marvin saves the film, for all that he alone can do to support it, and even Carole King, who wrote and sings the title song, falls flat of her expectations.

The Touch (Academy of Music, Northampton)

A probable disappointment for Bergman fans is his first English language film about a married couple and the disruption of their relationship by an American intruder. The revolving triangle is done with specious depth and the acting, specifically by Elliot Gould as the intruder, is disappointing. There is much to this film, as in all of Bergman, but here it's obscure or simply designed.

WR: Mysteries Of The Organism (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)

A film of some notorety of late due to the fact that all three of the Boston dailies refused to accept ads for it. The Herald refused to take any "X" advertising, the Globe insisted the WR of the title specifically refer to William Riech, the controversial psychologist whose work this film derives it satirical punches, and the Record thoughtfully assumed its readers would confuse "orgasm" with "organism" and the thought of such an occurrence would be a bit too much for its readers to handle. This film, which premiered at the New York Film Festival looks at the modes of personal expression in the Communist world and America.

X, Y, and Zee (Showcase Cinemas)

The most inanely titled film quite some time is this bitchy, romantic melodrama that reads like Modern Romance written by Edward Albee. The story concerns unhappy middle-aged marriage in contemporary London and the way three way affair employed to save it. It stars Susannah York as a young botique owner who has an affair with Michael Caine but has tendencies for his wife, Elizabeth Taylor, whose medusa-like presence makes for her most grotesque appearance since Boom! to be reviewed.

Theatre

Cabaret

This week in the Rathskellar, the musical theater production features an abridged version of Jacques Brel Is Alive And Well And Living In Paris. Poor Richard's went en masse to the previous performance and thinks it would be more aptly titled Jacques Brel Is Alive And Smells And Reaking In The Rathskellar. "It needs work," – Jim Lavrakas. Brel is perfect cultural pulp for the masses as his quint–essential "schtick" music and lyrics, apologies to Judith Crist, supposedly make for sardonic, intensely romantic ballads. Unfortunately they capture emotions with a feyness that passes for profundity, and a sentimentality that passes for pathos. The production is given its due tomorrow night at 8:30 and 10:30 in the Blue Wall Rathskellar. The performers try their best, but at times seem woefully weak and should realize that music is written to be sung and not spoken. Works under the assumption that if you get a few drinks into an audience, they'll enjoy just about anything, and they do, they do. ($).

Escurial

On Friday, Saturday and Sunday the Smith College department of theatre and speech will present "Escurial," a play by Michel de Ghelderode.

"Escurial" is a play which explores the enigma of the theatrical experience through the medium of a psychological puzzle. On one level, it is an account of the love-hatred existing between two men, the last of the Hapsburg kings of Spain and his court jester, a member of the oppressed people of Flanders. Beyond this is a study of the realities of experience and performance in which truth is arrived at sometimes only through masks, disguises and games. It is a theatre piece about theatre, an actor's analysis of his art.

Music

Amherst Folklore Center

Tonight at the Folklore Center, Spring Street, will feature blues singer Frank Clark and folk duo Jean and Kim, at 8. Tomorrow night, same time, country blues singer and guitarist Patty Nunn will perform. Pleasant surroundings and usually good music can be found at the Center some weeknights and every weekend. ($)

Five College Composers

A premiere performance of two works by local composers, Lewis Spratlan and Allen R. Bonde, will be given at Amherst College, Saturday at 8:15 p.m., Buckley Recital Hall. The works being performed for the first time are "Summer Music for Five Instruments" by Lewis Spratlan (Amherst College) and "Ten Rather Short Pieces for the Precocious Pianist Series I," by Allen R. Bonde (Mount Holyoke College). Also included in the program will be "A Little Bit of Music for Two Clarinets" by Robert Stern and "Reverberations for Organ and Electronic Sounds" by Ronald Perera UMass.

Marilyn Horne

Soprano Marilyn Horne will give a recital this coming Wednesday, March 1, 8:15 in John M. Greene Hall at Smith. Miss Horne is a singer of unique versatility possessing ability to move from Bach to Mahler with remarkable ease and having sung with every major opera company, from the Met to LaScala, and every leading symphony. Her program will include three songs by Henry Purcell, a group of four songs by Hugo Wolf, the Rossine aria "non Temper d'un Basso Afeto", and songs by Debussy and de Falla. ($)

Paul Kuentz Chamber Orchestra

The Paul Kuentz Chamber Orchestra of Paris will appear at UMass Monday and Tuesday at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. One of France's most distinguished ensembles, the Orchestra has traveled extensively, with a repertoire which spans three centuries, from 17th-century Vivaldi to 20th-century masters. The Orchestra is composed of 14 prize-winning instrumentalists. On this tour, the Orchestra will be joined by soloists Barbara Schlick, soprano, and Jean-Francois Dion, trumpet. Monday's program will include works by Mozart, Vivaldi, Bach, Joseph Mouret and Albert Roussel. Tuesday the program will consist of Handel, Bach, Scarlatti, and Daniel Lesur. ($)

Films

Arsenic And Old Lace (Friday, Blue Wall Rathskellar, 8)

The prime instance of success black humor during the Forties is Frank Capra's 1944 film version of the immensely successful stage comedy about two kindly, elderly murdering sisters and their bewildered nephew. The pace of the film is unrestrained and the caricatures are appropriately large, although the humor itself seems a bit thin by today's standards. Cary Grant plays the harried nephew, Josephine Hull and Jean Adair repeat their stage roles as murdering aunts, and featured in two humorously goulish supporting roles are Raymond Massey and Peter Lorre.

Blow-Up (Wednesday, Campus Center Auditorium, 7 and 9)

A purposively ambiguous, downright baffling study of the real and imagined that remains one of the superlative cinematic enigmas of the Sixties. David Hemmings plays a mod, bored, London photographer who takes some pictures of an idyllic scene in a park only to later realize he was witnessing a murder. As his interest increases, his evidence becomes more and more inconclusive. The film is a beautifully photographed, often striking look at the aimless high life of contemporary London as well as being an interesting philosophical mystery. The film was the first English language film of Michaelangelo Antonioni and is remarkably subtle and thoughtful, with a beautifully expressive performance by Vanessa Redgrave as the so-called murders.

Brewster McCloud

The film Robert Altman made between M*A*S*H and McCabe and Mrs. Miller is a delicious black farce that seemed to have slipped everyone's attention. The film is modern retelling of the Icarus myth which takes place most of the time in the Astrodome and concerns the often criminal exploits of a young man's (named Brewster McCloud) efforts to fly. He is assisted in his quest by a kindly fallen angel played by Altman regular Sally Kellerman. The satire is flawed in design, taking on a rather ill-conceived love affair to keep the mythic conventions intact, and is sometimes uneven in execution. Still Altman is best when jabbing satirical points home and there are many that work superbly. But Cort is effective as Brewster and the rest of the zany caricatures, from super patriots to super cool detectives, is well played by a large cast, featuring Stacey Keach, Shelley Duvall, and Margaret Hamilton.

Diabolique (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)

The teaming of the wife and mistress to do away with the man who has supposedly done them wrong is what this minor classic 1954 French thriller is about. There are enough twists in the plot to raise it above the morbidly interesting, and is spellbindedly directed by Henri–Georges Clouzot and beautifully performed by Simone signoret and Vera Clouzot.

Dirty Harry (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)

Detective Comics in Panavision with Clint Eastwood as a San Franciscan counterpart to crime-fighting the superhero comic strip characters. A shrewd, taut, well-made thriller that pits Eastwood as Dirty Harry against insane murderer named Scorpio. Harry is something to be seen as he singlehandedly quenches a bank robbery without even sweating and Scorpio often does Harry one better in this sharp fantasy thriller. The theme of the film is simplistic dribble about how liberals are responsible for letting culprits like Scorpio out on the streets and the message may be laid on a bit too thick at the end, still those apparent flaws are all but glossed over under the firm, ingenious hand of director Don Seigel.

The Endless Summer (Friday MacKimmie Lounge, 7 and 9)

Bruce Brown's beautiful documentary about surfing with the chills and spills of that sport captured with all the fun and excitement the sport possesses. Brown traveled the world filming the adventure of two young surfers' quest for the world's best surfing and the visuals of the African, Asian, Pacific, and North American beaches are quite breathtaking.

The Fox (Friday, Student Union Ballroom, 7:30 and 9:30)

Adapted from the novella by D. H. Lawrence, in name only, this film is an occasionally lewd, more often boring and heavy-handed examination of sexual politics at play in a desolate Canadian farmhouse. Two women have escaped their hometown to manage a farm in the Canadian wilderness until their tranquility is broken by a male intruder. The film gained notoreity as being the first to portray a homosexual relationship, here between the two women, with any degree of explicitness; the problem with the film is that it does little more than that. The Lawrencian undertones are pretty silly with such subtleties as huge trees falling on the guilty party and a male fox raiding the hens. The cast includes Anne Heywood, Kerr Dullea, and an unusually strident Sandy Dennis whose untimely end comes about six reels too late.

The French Connection (Wednesday, Academy)

A fact-based account of how police track down a shipment of heroin in New York City which is a fast, flashy, and fascinating thriller. The grittiness and chaos of New York City is captured at breakneck speed and brutality by director William Friedkin who has fashioned perhaps the stylish and finest thriller in some time. Gene Hackman plays a boorish detective who, as the antisocial, antihuman, detective, somewhere between Bullitt and Joe, the latest film cliche.

Fiddler on the Roof (Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)

A mundane version of the longest running musical in Broadway history. The disappointing epic comes away by director Norman Jewison who has employed needless flashy techniques in the transition. The musical becomes heavy and static when blown up on a Super Panavision screen and blasted out of twelve stereo speakers. The show itself has grace, charm, and a natural warmth that are all but eliminated here. Instead every moment reeks with phony folklines and cornball routines. The excellent Bock-Harnick score has been homogenized in musical interludes embarrassing at best, even Topol, generally considered the best of the stage Tevye's, becomes a glaring caricature of a poor, Russian peasant. An overrated, ill-conceived, charmless musical, with Norma Crane as the dutiful Goldie, and Molly Picon as Yente the Matchmaker.

The Go-Between (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)

A distinguished drama that excels in presenting marvelous rendering of Victorian England, some superlative acting, beautiful photography, and is competent enough in all other areas. Still, in the end it seems a bit too competent for its own good. It may have a cache of prizes under its belt and be on a goodly share of Ten Best Lists, it still remains a distinctly cold experience.

Hang 'Em High (Sunday, SU Ballroom, 7:30)

Another Clint Eastwood spaghetti western, this one an occasionally interesting film marred by needless violence. The story has Eastwood seeking revenge on some strangers who nearly lynched him. The supporting performances are strong especially those by Ed Begley and Pat Hingle, but the violent flavor is distinctly distasteful.

The Hospital (Showcase Cinemas, Springfield)

The world of a big city hospital is brought to life in this grim but often funny film that deals with bizarre and exaggerated situations of medical incompetence, the violent aspects of New York City life, and the bitter story of a middle-aged doctor who is suffering from the termination of a bad marriage. The film stars George C. Scott, Diana Rigg, and is directed by Arther Hiller, with script by Paddy Chayefsky.

It Happened One Night (Friday, Merrill Science Center, 7:30 and 10)

One of the best remembered films of the Thirties which features Clark Gable as a wandering journalist who meets up with Claudette Colbert as a runaway heiress for one of the most endearing combinations ever in a romantic comedy. The pace is fast, the humor often sharp, the performances are marvelous, and despite some age about the edges, still a wonderful comedy. The film was the first to win Oscars in all major categories as it won the 1934 Best Picture, Best Direction (Frank Capra, his finest work), Best screenplay, and Best performances by an actor and actress, Gable and Colbert.

The Last Picture Show (Palace Cinema, West Springfield)

The Best American Film of last year is this depressing, bleak vision of life about the coming of age of three youngsters in a small Texas town in 1951. Directed by Peter Bogdanovich, the film is a straightforward well-crafted, well-acted narrative about the perils of growing up in the finest tradition of the great Hollywood directors. The film is nostalgia in the negative sense and despite some near melodramatic plotting is the most poignant film in quite some time. The acting is superb by a cast of mostly

Wood To Appeal University Budget Cuts

By ROBERT MEDEIROS

UMass President Robert Wood, analyzing Gov. Sargent's recommended cuts of almost 20 per cent in budget requests by the University for the next year, said he will appeal the governor's decision to the state legislature.

Wood told the MDC last Friday that he would take his case to the Ways and Means Committee where he expects to receive a "sympathetic hearing." There has been no date set for his hearing before Ways and Means-a combined committee of the Massachusetts House and Senate.

Asked whether his efforts to restore the cuts would affect attempts by some individuals to increase tuition, Wood said, "tuition will be handled as a separate matter," and in no way will tuition be drawn into the issue of budget cuts.

Wood said a tuition increase "can't significantly help the state, since it would involve only an extra 4 or 5 million dollars to the state's financial problems.

Acting Chancellor Randolph Bromery in an MDC interview last Saturday said the people who get caught in the governor's recommended cuts are the students. He said the 15-1 faculty to student ratio at the University is threatened.

Wood in an earlier statement said, "No new faculty positions are authorized for any of our campuses, although the enrollment of 1,684 additonal students has been accepted." The freeze will supposedly affect 100 faculty positions in the University.

Bromery said that the UMass-Amherst campus is committed to accepting an increase of 860 students which under previous policy would involve the creation of 58 new faculty positions.

The UMass Board of Trustees last August in their budget presentation to Sargent requested $89 million, but this figure has now been cut to $72.5 million. The actual cutting of the $16.5 million is done by the governor's Office of Finance and Administration.

Bromery said "restoration is minute" compared to the governor's recommended $2 billion budget. He added that it would be unfortunate if the cuts were allowed to "erode away quality education for such a small amount of money."

On the question of none-state monetary support, Bromery said that input from non-state sources will also be tight this year. As he sees it, financial support from sources in this area has been going down in the last couple of years.

According to budgetary policy, Amherst is required to make savings in the final budget which is presented to the University. Essentially this means that a certain amount of monies must be saved and not spent from the budget.

In 1972 the allowance for savings at the Amherst campus was $1 million while the allowance in 1971 was $600,000. The allowance for savings for the fiscal 72-73 budget is $1.7 million which means an increase of $700,000 over the previous year.

Since the University may be operating under a "standstill budget," future cuts will have to be made in the overall budget. In the past faculty vacancies have provided much of the savings.

According to Bromery, there were 70 vacant faculty positions last year, but because of the financial state, fewer and fewer vacancies can be expected to occur. He said that under the governor's budget the number of faculty positions to meet the required amount of savings would have to increase to approximately 110.

It is for this reason that Vice-Chancellor for Academic Affairs Robert Glucksten told the Faculty Senate last Thursday that Substantial reductions may have to be made in the scope of the summer school program and in part-time student help funds. He also mentioned faculty vacancies as possible sources of savings.

An interesting aspect of the Governor's proposed budget is that it increases by approximately $7 million, the amount received over the previous year. But, said Bromery, there is a 6 per cent cost of living increase which involves an extra $3 million. He also cited a 6 to 7 per cent increase in inflation which eats away another 3 or 4 million dollars of the proposed $7 million increase.

The president in last Wednesday's trustees meeting said the budget "imperils the good name of the University" in recruiting faculty. Bromery said in order to recruit faculty it is necessary to recruit before the exact amount of funds available for recruiting is known.

Bromery said 20 letters have been sent out to faculty members of other institutions confirming positions for them at UMass next year. In other words these 20 faculty will have to be accepted into the University payroll despite the lack of necessary funds. To do otherwise would hurt the reputation of the University when it came time to recruiting faculty, Bromery said.

Wood has been accused of making a political blunder in that he did not pad the budget. Bromery said it was not a blunder since the governor and the legislature know who is "padding budgets." He said it would be a political mistake to pad a budget at this time since the state is facing a financial crisis, and any action of this type might undermine future efforts in making budget requests.

In a related development, it was reported that Sargent is expected to file major legislation within the next month that would "base tuition for all 80,000 public college and university students in Massachusetts on their family's income."

Secretary of Education. Joseph Cronin said over the weekend, "It's quite possible the governor will have a message and a bill relating to scholarships and tuition within the next three weeks."

President Wood at Wednesday's trustees meeting said, "For the third year the recommended appropriation for financial aid and for aid to disadvantaged students is $1,550,000--in contrast to the real need request the University made of $5,414,000 plus $282,000 for tutorial programs. With a growing enrollment next fall, the figure of $1,550,000 means aid per student will drop 7 per cent—while costs increase and needs grow."

On a tuition increase Bromery said, "I personally am an advocate of low tuition because the public university is the only educational vehicle that provides access to higher education to a sizable number of low-income students.

"Even if you increase tuition and then provide adequate scholarship aid, it still requires a certain amount of sophistication to obtain these funds, therefore putting pressure on low-income groups," continued Bromery. "The net effect is loss of accessability to low-income people."

Trustees Meet At Pierpont; Experimental College Proposed

By DAVID HOFFMAN

In a special meeting 6 members of the Board of Trustees challenged the Faculty Senate to take positive action to implement the idea of residential colleges on the Amherst campus, Sunday afternoon in Project 10.

The Board has been informally discussing the progress made at the University since the founding of Orchard Hill in developing academic programs for the living areas. The students of Project 10, the self-styled "experimental college" of the University, based in Pierpont House in Southwest, invited the Board to visit the Project to hear about the "living-learing" concept of education.

Acting through Student Senate President and Trustee Lee Sandwen, a Project member since its founding in 1968, two Board committees, Faculty and Educational Policy and Student Activities, decided to hold a special meeting with the students and faculty of the Project.

About 30 people gathered for lunch in the Pierpont Main Lounge, including Trustees Lee Sandwen, Alan Shaler, Ms. Caroline Rowland, Dr. Frederick Troy, Nathanael Chandler, and Dr. Abrams, along with Acting Chancellor Bromery, Vice-Chancellor Gluckstern and Vice-Chancellor Gage. Present from the Project were faculty members Klaus Schultz and Gerlad Platt, Project Director Charles Adams, and the Master of Southwest, John Hunt.

Gathered at small tables with students in the Project, the conversation quickly turned to the subject of the problems in creating alternative and innovative curricula at the University, implementing the recommendations of the Future University report specifying diversity of options for the UMass undergraduate.

One such proposal, soon to go before the Faculty Senate, is the idea advanced by students and faculty in Project 10, many of whom live in Pierpont, to develop an "experimental college" partially based in residence halls and providing the benefits of a small college within the large University, similar to "The College Within" at Tufts University and the "Inner College" at the University of Connecticut.

The Project proposal asks for a number of faculty members to be given partial assignment to a "college" emphasizing seminar and independent study, and individually-negotiated degrees, working with the present program in Bachelors Degree in Individual Concentration. The Project, with particular emphasis on the student-advisor relationship, would seek to design a new freshman year. Regular core requirements and grades would be eliminated, replaced by a portfolio of evaluations and a review board of outside examiners.

Trustee Abrams spoke of his fear that faculty would not wish to take part in such a program, and others agreed that in addition to disinterest from many faculty there is the real problem of the slender weighting in the reward system given to teaching in special programs.

But Project 10 Director Adams mentioned the letter by Vice-Chancellor Gluckstern of last spring recommending merit and promotion considerations for such participation, and that a change was beginning to take effect.

Both Ms. Rowland and Dr. Troy stated that that the Board was awaiting Faculty Senate recommendations but were favorably inclined to opening up a diversity of options in "both living and learning, such as Project 10, and similar programs."

In the packed gathering in the Main Lounge, many students said they wanted to see real changes emerge in what they described as "a 1950s-oriented curriculum."

Shaler said that simply to bring a few courses into the residence halls and call that a "residential college" is a sham, and that much more faculty participation is needed.

Troy, a former professor of English at UMass., put it more bluntly.

"The University should have actually built facilities which could house such an idea," he said, adding that more classrooms in the residence areas should have been built.

"The time for a strong University commitment to residential colleges is here," Sandwen said; "we need a reordering of some of our priorities so that we can guarantee the quality in residence hall programs that our students and faculty are demanding."

'Couples' Seminars Coming

The New England Center, an Amherst growth center founded by School of Education faculty and graduate students, is sponsoring a series of workshops and seminars for couples. The first of these workshops will take place next week on the University campus.

An introductory evening session entitled "Enhancing a Growth Relationship" will be held Wednesday, March 1st at 7 p.m. in room 127 of the Graduate Research Center. The evening's activities conducted by Jack Canfield and Susan LaFrance, will focus on the central issues of building awareness in a pair relationship-issues such as sharing feelings, making decisions together, resolving conflicts (fighting), and encouraging the uniqueness of each individual while developing an interdependent relationship. The cost of the evening will be six dollars per couple.

On the weekend of March 4-5, Jack Marvin will conduct a workshop entitled "Couples and Others-A Gestalt Encounter." This workshop is designed for couples who live, love or work together and for individuals who have been part of such a coupling. The workshop is designed to help people explore their interactions as part of a couple, how they can become closer and yet maintain their individuality as separate persons. Marvin promises to help participants stay honest with themselves and to experience new behavior for a more nourishing relationship.

Marvin is the co-director of a growth center in Boston, a past fellow of the BU Human Relations Center, a past Assistant Director of Vermont's Division of Mental Health. His most recent work has been in the area of Gestalt therapy with couples, both individually and in groups.

For further information on either of these workshops, contact the New England Center at 253-9686.

RFC To Petition Whitmore

By JAN LIVA

Anticipating increased student fees next semester, the Rents and Fees Committee (RFC) asks for student support in petitioning the Whitmore Administration. A spokesman for RFC, Ms. Pam Pepper, said that the petition is a "protest prior to the fact."

The petition gives students an organized method of voicing their displeasure concerning any possible fee hikes, Ms. Pepper said. It tells Whitmore that "the students can't afford to pay increases" she said.

The petition drive is in the Campus Center on the Concourse level and will continue all week. Committee members are expecting about 5,000-8,000 signatures. They will then be sent to Whitmore, where the RFC hopes the petitions will make a significant impact.

Written in letter form, the petition reads:

"Dear Whitmore,

As a student of the University of Massachusetts, already heavily burdened with exhorbitant rates, on services which do not seem to give me my "money's worth," and threatened with a tuition increase, I cannot possibly pay an increase in Rent, Board, Campus Center or other various fees.

I also firmly support the actions of the Student Senate in its attempt to prevent said fees from increasing.

Sincerely,"

Presently, various annual fees at UMass-Amherst include: room-$610(the median prices range from $550-$700); board $613 (15 meal plan); athletic fee-$30; Campus Center fee-$60; Fine Arts fee-$6; and Student Activities tax-$40. RFC feels that any of these fees may increase next year.

Unofficial reports claim that some room rates may increase by as much as $60 per year and the Campus Center fee may go up an additional $15 annually. But this is speculative.

An administration spokesman, Mr. Charles Hampton, feels that prices for service can't go down without the quality also declining. About price increases, he said, "I can't even make a prediction," adding that it would be wiser to wait until late March or early April to make a statement. By that time the UMass budget will be completed.

Reasons cited by the RFC for a possible dormitory rent increase include:

Low occupancy. Since occupants are the main source of income for a dormitory, fewer occupants means fewer people dividing the same costs. This means higher prices. Levels of 95% occupancy hold their own financially. But this year occupancy has been as low as 88.5% and presently hovers at 90%. "Sylvan is an example of a dorm that is not paying for itself," said an RFC spokesman.

Rising maintenance costs. Janitorial service costs amounted to almost $1,000,000 this year. Dormitory damage alone costs $20,000 per year.

Utility costs. Utility costs will be going up to approximately an additional $13,000 over last year.

Government service discontinued. Beginning in September, the Postal Service will cease delivering mail to the dormitories. Mail will continue to be delivered but it will cost the students an additional $60,000 annually.

RFC is a committee composed of Student Senate members. The RFC works with Mr. Thomas Campion and the Office of the Vice Chancellor For Administrative Services. Mr. Campion's office presents the UMass budget to the RFC and both groups decide where budget cuts can be made. The RFC, representing the student viewpoint, strives to keep prices at their present level.

Corrected Grades Ready

Student copies of the Fall 1971 semester corrected grade reports will be available in the Registrar's office, Room 213, Whitmore, beginning today. The Parent copy will be mailed on Friday, March 3. Please be prepared to present your ID when calling for grades.

Much material is mailed from the Registrar's office to the student's local address. So that this office may deliver the service to which the student is entitled, it is extremely important that changes in the student's local address be reported promptly to the Housing office, Room 315, Whitmore.

Senate To Issue Concert Ballots

By NATHAN GORENSTEIN

This week the Concert Committee will be distributing ballots to students in an effort to discover which groups the largest number of students would prefer to see perform at a Spring Concert.

The ballot will list approximately 10 groups for students to pick from. These include J. Geils, Dave Mason, Mountain with Jack Bruce, Buddy Miles, King Crimson and Quicksilver. Students will also be able to write in a group they would like to see perform. The ballot will be distributed by the Student Senate.

The concert will be held in the Stadium, some weekend at the end of April. It will be five hours long with an expected attendance of 5,000 to 7,500. It will be free. In addition to outside talent they hope to have a number of local bands playing. "We are trying to get good local groups. Probably they would be unpaid, maybe a small fee for expenses."

Student Senators Gary Gomes and Bill Staton explained that at this time the Concert Committee has $8,000 which would be enough to get one of the bands listed above, or another of student choice, providing that the bands cost was no more than $8,000. The cost of the groups above range from $3,500 to $7,500. It is unlikely that a well known group, such as those that have been rumored, the Who or Rod Stewart will perform.

Staton and Gomes explained that the $8,000 the Committee has now is enough, with a small amount of extra funds, to hire one of the groups listed, and provide for security (estimated at $1,800), and other necessary expenses.

The Committee hopes to raise the extra funds needed by having a coffee house, asking the area dorm governments for contributions, or perhaps having a series of free concerts in the SU Ballroom where the Committee could ask for donations. Gomes and Staton stressed that, "The more money we get, the more groups we can get."

The proposed concert still must get final approval from the administration, but both Gomes and Staton think this will not be a stumbling block. They pointed out that Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Gage has come out in favor of a small, free concert; the type the Committee how plans to put on. A meeting between the Committee and the administration is scheduled for this afternoon.

The Committee's security proposal would have Campus Police only outside the stadium to direct traffic. In the stadium the security would be provided by student marshals. Staton said he foresees no trouble.

"The concert is set up for people to have a good time," he said. "We don't expect any rowdiness, or people causing damage. There won't be any reason for it."

Gomes and Staton also announced that the Concert Committee is now officially linked to the Student Senate. At the last Senate meeting it was made a subcommittee of the Student Matters and Social Action Committee of the Student Senate. Previously it has been an independent body.

Nixon Sees Trip As World-Changing

SHANGAI (AP) — His visit over, President Nixon flew homeward Monday with the vision of a new era in relations for the billion humans who populate China and the United States.

The President spoke of his eight days on Chinese soild as "the week that changed the world."

Before embarking on his 8-1/2 hour flight to Anchorage, Alaska, the President said goodbye to Premier Chou En-lai. The two leaders joined in a 1,750-word communique highlighting their countries' differences but agreeing on an overall pledge to work toward peace and to foreswear any attempted domination of Asia by either Washington or Peking.

Both sides affirmed there can be only one China, and Nixon promised that the United States will move toward withdrawing all its forces from Taiwan.

There was no agreement on Indochina, but the President foresaw the withdrawal of all American forces "in the absence of a negotiated settlement."

Here are the viewpoints of the United States and People's Republic of China as expressed in a communique summing up five talks between President Nixon and Premier Chou En-lai last week in Peking.

THE WORLD

The United States: Supports individual freedom and social progress for all the world free of outside intervention or pressure. Favors improved communications between countries of differing ideologies. Countries should treat each other with mutual respect and none should claim infallibility over others: all nations should re-examine their attitudes for common good.

China: "All nations, big or small, should be equal; big nations should not bully the small and the strong nations should not bully the weak. China will never become a superpower..." Peking supports struggles of "all oppressed people and nations" and maintains that all have a right to choose their own social sytems. "All foreign troops should be withdrawn to their own countries."

INDOCHINA

The United States: The Indochinese people should be allowed to determine their own destiny without outside interference. The U.S. government favors a negotiated settlement on the basis of the eight-point U.S.-South Vietnamese proposal of January 27 calling for elections and resignation of President Thieu of South Vietnam a month before balloting.

China: Peking supports the Viet-Cong 7-point proposal, including immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces and dismantling of Thieu's regime as elaborated by the Viet-Cong earlier this month.

JAPAN

The United States: It places the highest value on friendly relations with Japan and will continue to do so.

China: "It firmly opposes the revival and outward expansion of Japanese militarism and firmly supports the Japanese people's desire to build an independent, democratic, peaceful and neutral Japan."

KOREA

The United States: It will maintain close ties with South Korea and support efforts for a relaxation of tension and increased communication on the Korean peninsula.

China: It supports North Korea's proposals for reunification of the two Koreas and for the withdrawal of the U.N. Command in Korea.

INDIA AND PAKISTAN

Both agreed that India and Pakistan should withdraw their military forces from both sides of cease-fire lines in Jammu and Kashmir. The United States said it suppggrts "the right of the peoples of South Asia to shape their own future in peace, free of military threat and without having the area become a subject of big-power rivalry." China said it "firmly supports the Pakistan goverment and people in their struggle to preserve their independence and sovereignty and the people of Jammu and Kashmir in their struggle for the right of self-determination."

U.S.-CHINESE RELATIONS

Both acknowledged essential differences remain, but agreed that regardless of their social systems the United States and China should conduct relations on the principles of respect for sovereignty and territorial integrity of all states, of nonaggression, of non-interference in internal affairs of others, on equality and equal benefit and peaceful co-existence. Both agreed that it is against the interest of world peace for any major country to collude with another against other countries or for major countries to divide the world in spheres of interest. They proposed continuing contacts between the United States and China through science, culture, technology, sports, journalism and trade. They suggested periodic diplomatic contacts for concrete consultations on normalizing relations between Washington and Peking.

Boston Company Begins Four-Day Work Week

BOSTON (AP) — The four-day work week is coming Monday for 290 of the 7,000 home office employes of the John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. as an experiment.

The company, one of the largest insurance firms in the nation, said the experiment will continue through May 26.

Salaries of the participating employes will not be changed, although their work week will be shortened from 37-1/2 to 35 hours.

Their work day, however, will increase by 65 minutes. They will work from 8:15 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. instead of from 8:20 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

The work week for the affected employes "will be staggered," said Russell Keith, the company's public relations director.

"Some people will work Monday to Thursday, others Tuesday to Friday, and others will have a day off in the middle of the week," he said.

Employes will be questioned during the experiment, and "we expect to get a lot of different views on this thing," Keith said.

He said the company expects to evaluate the program during and after the 13-week experiment and determine later to what, if any, extent a four-day work week will be instituted.

Employes involved are in the record services, direct collection, mail and data preparation divisions of the company.

Irish Rally Ends Peacefully

LONDONDERRY, Northern Ireland (AP)-The first mass demonstration in this troubled city since 13 civilians died on "bloody Sunday" four weeks ago ended peacefully Sunday, avoiding confrontations with British troops who had cordoned off the Roman Catholic Bogside district with armored cars.

More than 3,000 Catholic militants, their numbers restricted by driving rain, defied a ban on parades to retrace the steps of the fateful Jan. 30 march they were commenorating. That occasion ended in riots and gunfire, leaving 13 men and boys dead.

This time the parade moved into a meeting in the Bogside to hear speeches without major clashes.

Shots were fired at two army posts on city walls overlooking the Bogside near the start of the march, and at a helicopter circling overhead, but army spokesmen there were no casualties and no fire was returned.

The stench of tear gas hung over the two-mile parade route from canisters set off during the march. But the army said they had not fired them.

The procession was organized by the Derry Women's Action Committee, a militant Catholic group, with the backing of Sinn Fein, political branch of the outlawed Irish Republican Army.

It was boycotted by the more moderate civil rights leaders of the Catholic community here, including John Hume, who represents the Bogside in the provincial parliament.

Bernadette Devlin, fiery member of the British Parliament in London, spoke at the mass meeting. By that time the crowd had dwindled to only a few hundred.

Speakers made these demands:

1. Release of Irish political prisoners.
2. Withdrawal of British troops from Northern Ireland.
3. Abolition of the Protestant-controlled provincial parliament.

During the open-air mass meeting, youths tried to break away and make trouble. They were stopped by stewards controlling the demonstration.

Once the meeting was over, however, the youths moved out to confront the troops at several points, hurling stones and bottles. One soldier was taken to a hospital.

Berrigan Witness Leaves Seclusion

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP)-The government's chief witness at the Harrisburg 7 conspiracy trial comes out of hiding this week to testify how he kept the FBI informed about an alleged antiwar plot to kidnap presidential adviser Henry Kissinger.

Boyd Douglas, Jr. disappeared 13 1/2 months ago, immediately after he was paroled from prison, and went secretly before a federal grand jury that later indicted the Rev. Phillip Berrigan and his six codefendants on conspiracy charges centered around their opposition to the Vietnam war.

Mid-East Mobilizes

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Israeli guns, war planes, tanks and commandos were reported hammering Palestinian guerrilla positions in southeast Lebanon Sunday for the third straight day.

Lebanon said its own army troops and tanks had joined the fight. Syria announced its antiaircraft guns fired on Israeli jets sweeping over the Golan Heights.

Egypt's Middle East News Agency reported from Damascus that Syria's 100,000-man regular army had been put on full alert by President Hafez al Assad.

President Suleimen Franjieh of Lebanon summoned his National Defense Council into urgent session. Yasir Arafat, overall leader of Arab guerrillas, was invited.

Israeli Phantom and Skyhawk figher-bombers attacked shortly before noon and witnesses reported from the area that rockets and bombs set several fires. Israeli bulldozers, shielded by tanks, crossed the border from the occupied Golan Heights of Syria and continued work on a new road into the Arkoub area on the Lebanese slopes of Mt. Hermon, guerrillas reported.

The Lebanese said an Israeli armored column drove into southern Lebanon in the wake of an air and artillery bombardment.

"Our forces are locked in savage hand-to-hand fighting with enemy commandos," the guerrillas reported to Beirut, Lebanon's capital.

Helicopter-borne Israeli troops fought their way into the little mountain town of Rashayya, four miles inside Lebanon, to blow up several houses suspected of being guerrilla hideouts, according to the witnesses. Nearby villages were the scene of similar fighting.

A Lebanese army communique reported waves of Israeli plans and heavy artillery bombed and shelled the Arkoub region since early morning.

An Israeli armored column, estimated at battalion strength, crossed the border from the Golan Heights, the communique said.

"Our heavy guns engaged the enemy," it reported.

A Lebanese dispatch said Israeli Skyhawks made a seven-minute bombing raid on a Palestinian refugee camp at Nabatiye, 10 miles from the frontier. The camp houses about 3,000 refugees. It was the deepest attack yet made into Lebanon. Palestinian officials said six children were killed and 10 other persons were wounded.

Witness accounts from Lebanon said at least 20 Israeli tanks and armored personnel carriers crossed the Hasbani River, eight miles from the border, and within mortar range of a Lebanese army garrison shortly before nightfall.

Lebanese tanks were ordered into battle positions and traded shellfire with the Israelis, witnesses said.

Thousands of Lebanese villagers and peasant farmers, carrying belongings on their heads, fled the embattled area.

The Israeli military command in Tel Aviv said its ground forces jabbed into Lebanon in a search-and-destroy operation against Arab guerrillas.

A military spokesman claimed the raid was touched off by guerrilla gunfire from southeast Lebanon.

The fire was silenced and several houses believed harboring the Arab commandos were blown up, he said.

Two Israeli soldiers were wounded in the assault, he said. The Tel Aviv command said Israeli jets struck eight miles inside Lebanon, strafing what it called "the general headquarters of the terrorist organizations in southern Lebanon."

The planes made "accurate hits" and all planes returned safely to base, a spokesman said.

The military command said Defense Minister Moshe Dayan and the chief of staff, Lt. Gen. David Elazar, visited troops in the Mt. Hermon region, apparently while the battle was in progress.

Israel claims 5,000 Palestinian guerrillas are based in southern Lebanon.

The U.N. Security Council met in New York Saturday night to discuss a Lebanese complaint of Israeli aggression, but failed to reach a decision or set a date for another session.

Guerrilla leader Arafat said Sunday the new Israeli road being built into Lebanon is aimed at establishing military control over guerrilla bases and their supply routes from Syria.

Arafat said in a press statement that 18 guerrillas were killed and 34 wounded in the three days of fighting.

Benefits Increase Expected

WASHINGTON (AP) — Almost no one on Capitol Hill now doubts that the election-year Congress will enact a big boost in Social Security benefits before November.

But a question affecting all 27 million beneficiaries remains to be resolved:

—Will the increase be spread impartially to all of them-as Rep. Wilbur D. Mills, D-Ark., proposed in his surprise 20-percent-raise legislation?

—Or will there be a sliding scale favoring the low end of the income spread, on the principle that no Social Security recipient should remain below the poverty level?

The graduated approach is favored by influential members of the Senate Finance Committee. Senator and presidential hopeful Hubert H. Humphrey also has embraced it with an announcement he will offer an amendment.

There is no single figure accepted throughout the government as representing the poverty level. For comparative purposes, the Senate subcommittee on aging uses a "poverty threshhold" figure that works out to a national average of about $154 a month for a single aged person, $194 for a couple.

The present Social Security minimums, $70.40 and $105.60, are clearly below these figures.

The 20 percent across-the-board boost proposed by Mills, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, would produce minimums of $84.48 and $126.72, still well under the "threshhold."

Humphrey's proposal would shoot the minimums up to $165 and $215, appreciably above it.

Arguments for an even proportional increase include:

—Among those receiving minimum Social Security benefits is a substantial proportion not dependent mainly on the system; for example, government workers who retire on Civil Service pensions who also qualified for the Social Security minimum.

The argument goes that it is hardly fair to those who have paid into Social Security during a working lifetime to scale down their added benefits for the advantage of those more loosely attached to the system. The benefit scale already has some bias toward lowest incomes.

—From its inception in 1936, Social Security has been wage-related, with benefits generally proportioned to contributions, thus preserving the pride of the retirees.

The defenders of this concept say the more the system is tilted in favor of the low end of the scale, the further it departs from the wage relationship and the more it comes to resemble welfare.

If Congress should look for a compromise between the two approaches, as appears likely, the House-passed legislation now before the Senate Finance Committee offers alternatives.

This bill contains welfare reform and a 5 percent Social Security benefit increase, now apparently to be superceded.

Among its provisions is a new federal welfare scale for the aged and disabled, guaranteeing higher individual benefits. The government would pay the whole amount to those receiving no Social Security payments or other income, or make up the difference for those with lower Social Security benefits and other resources.

Adjustment of these guarantee figures could be a way to bring recipients up to the poverty level without arousing fears that Social Security was being transformed.

Communique Studied By Taiwan's Gov't.

TAIPEI, Taiwan (AP) — The Shanghai communique raises major questions about the future of Taiwan but for the moment, the Nationalist Chinese government is not even going to try to give any answers. A Foreign Ministry spokesman said a statement on the Nixon-Chou communique is being delayed.

"There will be no comment today," he told reporters, "and I don't know if there will be any tomorrow."

Sources close to the ministry suggested the delay was to give the government more time to study the communique, which one called "very important but very complex." They said the decision to delay comment was made by officials "above the Foreign Ministry level."

The communique was issued in Shanghai Sunday by President Nixon and People's Republic of China Prime Minister Chou En-lai. In the communique, Chou's position couldn't be clearer:

"The Taiwan question is the crucial question obstructing the normalization of relations between China and the United States. Taiwan is a province of China...The liberation of Taiwan is China's internal affair... All U.S. forces and military installations must be withdrawn from Taiwan."

The United States has usually agreed that Taiwan is part of China-because Nationalist Chinese President Chiang Kaishek, too, claims it is-and repeated that position in the communique.

But the Nationalists were left not knowing where they stand, because the meaning of "China" has changed.

It used to mean Chiang's government. Now it means Mao's, and the difference means the Nationalists may have had the rug pulled out from under them.

What has people here even more worried is that while agreeing Taiwan is part of China, the United States also agreed to govern its relations with China according to Chou's five principles of peaceful coexistence, one of which is non-interference in the internal affairs of other states.

The American promise in the communique eventually to withdraw "all U.S. forces and military installations" from Taiwan makes this even more alarming to the people of Taiwan, even though U.S. force reductions have been expected for months, particularly as the Vietnam war winds down.

U.S. Position Precarious In The Mediterranean

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Soviet Navy has free access to seven major ports in the Mediterranean, and its fleet is using an additional six anchorages in that area, a study on "Soviet Advances in the Middle East" reports.

"The balance between the Soviet Mediterranean fleet and the U.S. Sixth Fleet in 1971 thus appeared to be precarious," Prof. George Lenczowski of the University of California, Berkeley, said in the study released Sunday by the American Enterprise Institute, a private group.

"In purely legal sense these facilities available to Soviet armed forces were not formally granted bases," the California political scientist said. The Russians, he said, "avoided concluding formal lease-hold agreements. These might have had a connotation of imperialism and might have exposed the Soviet Union to dangerous comparisons with Western powers..."

The study listed the seven docking and bunkering facilities available for the Soviets as follows: Lattakia in Syria; Alexandria, Port Said and Mersa Matruh in Egypt; and Algiers, Bone and Mers el-Kebir in Algeria.

The six Mediterranean anchorages are in the Gulf of Hammamat off the eastern coast of Tunisia; the Gulf of Sirte off the coast of Libya; in the Sicilian Channel between Sicilty and Tunisia; in the seas off the Greek Islands of Kytheres and Antikythera south of the Peloponesus, off the island of Karpathos; and for submarines off the Spanish Alberan island, just 135 miles east of Gibraltar.

This latter, Leczowski said is "particularly well placed for Soviet submarines to watch movements of NATO ships between the Mediterranean and the Atlantic."

The growing number of air bases in Arab states on the southern shore of the Mediterranean strengthened the Soviet naval position and "counteracted the power of American aircraft carriers, he reported.

Should the Soviets acquire the Wheelus Airbase in Libya, evacuated by the Americans two years ago, this would shift the balance of power in the Mediterranean in favor of the Soviets, he added.

There is, however, little chance that Libya "with fresh memories of massive foreign presence" on its territory, would permit the Soviets the use of Wheelus, the study said.

Sarge's Plan Would Link Income To Tuition

Gov. Sargent is expected to submit legislation within the next month that would base tuition for all 80,000 public college and university students in Massachusetts on their family's income.

A "confidential memo from the governor" outlining the proposal is now circulating among the boards and presidents of the 30 state and community colleges and universities.

While the members of the governor's and education secretary's staff who developed the plan emphasize that it is still only a rough draft, they say the final version is certain to be tied to family income.

Sargent, in a major education speech last April, hinted at the income-based tuition plan. "It is foolish," he said, "to allow the children of the rich to attend a state college or university for the same charges that are paid by the children of the factory worker."

Kevin Harrington, president of the Senate, has supported similar plans in the past and says he is "still of the same frame of mind" this year.

Education Secretary Joseph Cronin, while declining to comment on the details of the proposed plan, said an income-based plan is "ever so much fairer than an across-the-board increase for everyone."

"We hope we can link a selective increase for those able to pay with an increase in scholarship aid," Cronin said.

In past years, the governing boards of the public colleges and universities have vigorously opposed an increase in the flat $200 tuition fee that has been in effect since 1959. But as public education costs have risen, so that the pressure for tuition increase. Some politicians and educators think this may be the year for a hike of some kind.

The college boards and their staffs are hastily trying to reach some common position on Sargent's plan and other tuition proposals by March 7, when the legislative committee on education will hold a tuition hearing.

The boards, including the coordinating Board of Higher Education, have serious reservations about the draft version of Sargent's plan.

This version calls for students with family incomes below $5000 to pay no tuition at all. Those incomes from $5000 to $15,000 would pay the same $200 tuition now in effect. Those with family incomes greater than $15,000 would pay $500 tuition.

Developers of the plan say that these levels will probably be modified to make the transitions between income groups smoother.

Other features of the draft plan include raising out-of-state students' tuition from $600 to $1200. This would bring an estimated $4 million income, which would be earmarked for a new public higher education scholarship fund that would provide 20,000 scholarships for needy students.

The $8 million scholarship fund, administered by the Board of Higher Education, now gives $1.5 million to public colleges and $6.5 to private colleges. This would all be allocated to Massachusetts students attending private colleges and would aid an estimated 12,000 students and also provide some help for hard-pressed private colleges.

Another provision of the draft would use the $10 college application fee for a graduate scholarship fund. The provision, however, seems likely to be dropped.

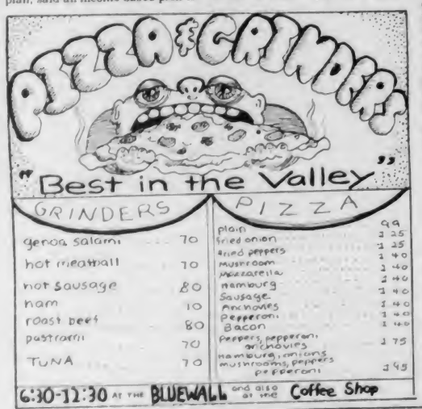
According to the proposal, extra income from the increased out-of-state tuition and the $500 from top income brackets would balance the additional money needed for scholarships for low and middle income students. The additional cost to the state would be only $350,000. It is estimated that about 10,000 students would pay no tuition at all, and another 20,000 would get full tuition scholarships. This would mean that 40 percent of all public college and university students would go to school tuition free.

State higher education officials see several weaknesses in the draft. They argue that a family's ability to pay, which includes number of children and other factors, should be used rather than a flat income figure.

They also contend that the income from additional out-of-state tuition is over estimated. (There are about 3100 out-of-state students which would yield $3.7 million.) Another problem with this figure, one university official said, is that with 18-year-olds registering to vote where they go to college, there is some question about who is "out-of-state."

But by far the most serious objection, and the one used in the past against tuition increases, is that they will raise more barriers to higher education for low-income groups. A study done for the Board of Higher Education last year estimated that an increase of just $100 would keep about 4000 potential students out of public colleges.

Scholarship funds are now described as "woefully inadequate" to meet the need. This year there were 14,000 applications for freshman scholarships. Only 2500 could be granted. This year there is $8 million in scholarship money. For next year, Sargent has recommended only $4.6 million.



In his testimony before the education committee last year, University of Massachusetts President Robert Wood said the promise of scholarhip aid often "fails to materialize, or if it does, it never catches up with the need created by the new tuition-let alone the need that existed already."

Despite their reservations, however, public higher education officials believe Sargent's proposal, or something similar, may be enacted this year.

"This year, of all years, a change in tuition is being seriously considered," Patrick McCarthy, acting chancellor of higher education, told his board recently. "We're past studying this subject...we're at a point where we've got to make up our minds."

The board voted to hire Tufts economist Arthur Corazzini, who made last year's tuition study, to quickly analyze the tuition measures that will come up for hearing March 7. The hope is that the board, along with the governing boards of state and community colleges and UMass, will be able to agree on a joint position by that time. The legislative committee of the state college board reportedly already has agreed to support a $100 tuition increase.

In addition to whatever finally emerges as Sargent's proposal the boards will have to decide on dozens of other tuition bills, including one drafted by the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation and filed by Rep. Laurence Golden (D-Framingham). The bill, similar to one filed last year by the foundation, calls for tuition based on 35-55 percent of the per-student cost at each of the colleges and universities. Sample tuitions, based on 1971-72 operating coats, would be: community colleges, $390 to $615; state colleges, $515 to $810; UMass-Boston, $715-$1125; UMass-Amherst $810 to $1430.

Belchertown - When The Retarded Grow Up

(Editor's note: This is the fifth in a six-part series on the conditions at the Belchertown State School for the Retarded. It was first printed two years ago in the Springfield Union. However, conditions at the school have changed little from that time. The series was written by James Shanks.)

Retarded children grow up. Contrary to a popular myth, they do not remain "children" forever.

Although many parents are able to care for their retarded children until adulthood, a serious problem exists for them once that child reaches majority.

When a parent who has managed to care for a retarded child for many years dies or becomes too sick to continue, this produces a truly traumatic experience for the family and the retarded son or daughter.

Almost the only solution at present is Belchertown, the human warehouse, the place without affection, the place which turns people into vegetables or caged animals.

The majority of retarded adults, however, can be nearly self-sufficient and semi-independent, able to earn a largeportion or all of their needed income, IF—

If, there is an adequate number of sheltered workshops and group living centers. But there isn't!

A sheltered workshop is a place where the retarded (or, in other contexts the handicapped or blind) are employed, either permanently or in training to take regular jobs in industry.

A group living center is a home, boarding house, apartment complex or whatever which provides an independent home atmosphere with needed supervision. It could be described as a sheltered sorority or fraternity house or college dormitory.

With these two alternatives to institutionalization, the retarded adult is capable of becoming a productive member of society and a taxpayer instead of a heavy drain on society.

For many people now residing in Belchertown, it opens the way for release into an environment where they can once again become human — and productive, further reducing the drain on tax resources.

Yet, Goodwill Industries now operates the only sheltered workshop for the retarded in Springfield. The Northampton area has one, with a workshop recently opened in Greenfield. Others are urgently needed in Springfield, Holyoke, Westfield and Chicopee.

The workshops are vital not only because they provide employment, but because they train persons who can go into private industry.

Matthew Petoniak, director of the Occupational and Vocational Development Center for the Handicapped in Florence, emphasized the adaptability of the retarded for work in industry.

"Given the proper pre-training," he said, "the retarded can do almost any repetitive assembly line job. It's amazing the other jobs they can also do in industry, more than the simple assembly line or non-complex task.

"They can be taught to operate machinery, lathes, grinders, drill presses, many other things.

"But," Petoniak emphasized, "they must first be taught something the ordinary person knows immediately — respect for the machine.

"We know a whirring blade will cut off a finger if we touch it. The retarded person must be taught that."

One of the most important things a workship teaches is the values of work.

"We must, as our first task, teach the retardate a whole new value system," he said.

"He must be trained to arrive on time, to learn the value of producing something, to learn the importance of punching a clock out on his break and punching it in 15 minutes later — not 20 or 25.

"The abilities are there," Petoniak said. "We must develop and bring them out so the retarded person can function as a member of the community and the industrial society."

Petoniak's organization is associated with the "Flame of Hope," a Kennedy Foundation project which makes jewelry and candles at 13 centers throughout the country.

Florence is unique in producing two expensive perfumes, introduced in late 1969 and sold at quality department stores around the country.

Some 30 persons work in Florence. About 10 are being evaluated to determine their fitness for industry or sheltered workshop employment.

Some may be found unfit for any work. They will be referred to day care centers or to institutions such as Belchertown because there is now nowhere else for them to go.

Seven to nine persons are undergoing personality adjustment to work out emotional problems which keep them from working effectively.

The remaining dozen are working on an extended basis of eight months to a year in hopes they will eventually be placed in industry after training. They will probably be placed in the larger plants around Northampton which can "carry" them for a period of

Belchertown - When The Retarded Grow Up

(Editor's note: This is the fifth in a six-part series on the conditions at the Belchertown State School for the Retarded. It was first printed two years ago in the Springfield Union. However, conditions at the school have changed little from that time. The series was written by James Shanks.)

Retarded children grow up. Contrary to a popular myth, they do not remain "children" forever.

Although many parents are able to care for their retarded children until adulthood, a serious problem exists for them once that child reaches majority.

When a parent who has managed to care for a retarded child for many years dies or becomes too sick to continue, this produces a truly traumatic experience for the family and the retarded son or daughter.

Almost the only solution at present is Belchertown, the human warehouse, the place without affection, the place which turns people into vegetables or caged animals.

The majority of retarded adults, however, can be nearly self-sufficient and semi-independent, able to earn a largeportion or all of their needed income, IF—

If, there is an adequate number of sheltered workshops and group living centers. But there isn't!

A sheltered workshop is a place where the retarded (or, in other contexts the handicapped or blind) are employed, either permanently or in training to take regular jobs in industry.

A group living center is a home, boarding house, apartment complex or whatever which provides an independent home atmosphere with needed supervision. It could be described as a sheltered sorority or fraternity house or college dormitory.

With these two alternatives to institutionalization, the retarded adult is capable of becoming a productive member of society and a taxpayer instead of a heavy drain on society.

For many people now residing in Belchertown, it opens the way for release into an environment where they can once again become human — and productive, further reducing the drain on tax resources.

Yet, Goodwill Industries now operates the only sheltered workshop for the retarded in Springfield. The Northampton area has one, with a workshop recently opened in Greenfield. Others are urgently needed in Springfield, Holyoke, Westfield and Chicopee.

The workshops are vital not only because they provide employment, but because they train persons who can go into private industry.

Matthew Petoniak, director of the Occupational and Vocational Development Center for the Handicapped in Florence, emphasized the adaptability of the retarded for work in industry.

"Given the proper pre-training," he said, "the retarded can do almost any repetitive assembly line job. It's amazing the other jobs they can also do in industry, more than the simple assembly line or non-complex task.

"They can be taught to operate machinery, lathes, grinders, drill presses, many other things.

"But," Petoniak emphasized, "they must first be taught something the ordinary person knows immediately — respect for the machine.

"We know a whirring blade will cut off a finger if we touch it. The retarded person must be taught that."

One of the most important things a workship teaches is the values of work.

"We must, as our first task, teach the retardate a whole new value system," he said.

"He must be trained to arrive on time, to learn the value of producing something, to learn the importance of punching a clock out on his break and punching it in 15 minutes later — not 20 or 25.

"The abilities are there," Petoniak said. "We must develop and bring them out so the retarded person can function as a member of the community and the industrial society."

Petoniak's organization is associated with the "Flame of Hope," a Kennedy Foundation project which makes jewelry and candles at 13 centers throughout the country.

Florence is unique in producing two expensive perfumes, introduced in late 1969 and sold at quality department stores around the country.

Some 30 persons work in Florence. About 10 are being evaluated to determine their fitness for industry or sheltered workshop employment.

Some may be found unfit for any work. They will be referred to day care centers or to institutions such as Belchertown because there is now nowhere else for them to go.

Seven to nine persons are undergoing personality adjustment to work out emotional problems which keep them from working effectively.

The remaining dozen are working on an extended basis of eight months to a year in hopes they will eventually be placed in industry after training. They will probably be placed in the larger plants around Northampton which can "carry" them for a period of

Fighting The End

Every once and a while you pick up a newspaper and somewhere in the back pages there is a story about someone predicting an ecological catastrophe within the next ten or twenty years.

They say the oceans will die from the poisons we are daily pouring into them; that the average temperature across the face of the earth will rise, a symptom of all the pollution we blow into the atmosphere; or some other scenario for our doom.

The one thing no one ever considers is that it's true. We are well along the way to killing ourselves off and few seem to care.

However, the few that do care are doing something about that and all the technological plagues that haunt our nation and the world. One group that has just been formed and is actively working in this area is WMPIRG. (Western Massachusetts Public Interest Research Groups)

They are trying to do something about the things that everyone complains about but do nothing to stop. Pollution, food additives, the ecological tape of our country, dishonest politics-all the things that got us into the trouble we're in now, and that are pushing us along the road to more.

WMPIRG is trying to stop all that. They deserve our support.

The Poems Of Richard Nixon

WASHINGTON–President Nixon is prepared for any emergency that might arise while he is in China. His staff has been working for months on every contingency the President might face. I can now reveal that the President, after hearing that Mao Tse-tung writes poetry, is carrying poetry of his own in his briefcase to read to Mao when the occasion presents itself. These are the poems that Nixon could spring on Mao Tse-tung at any time:

If I must fly in a Chinese plane, will Air Force One be far behind?

I stand at the Great Wall
with Pat at my side.
And as I breathe the centuries of history,
the New Hampshire primary looks very small.

There are no clouds in the sky,
the wind is but a whisper in the trees,
lakes sparkle as birds sing,
it's a good day to bomb Cambodia.

The journey of a thousand miles must begin with one single step.
Unless you go to school and have to take a bus.

Daybreak comes quietly,
sneaking up on the dark.
The sun finally commands the earth.
I hope Kissinger had a good night.

A dog barks, an eagle cries.
The birds take flight,
the deer stand frightened.
I told them Phase II would work.

The streams rush down from the mountain washing the rocks with blue.
The woods are filled with buds
as spring wipes the frost from her eyes.
I wonder if it's too early in the year to call a football coach.

I made this journey into yesterday because I must think about tomorrow.
If I should trip or lose my way
I'll deny it.

When I look at the universe, I am nothing.
When I look at a rose, I am nothing.
When I look at a newborn baby, I am nothing.
When I look at the ocean, I am nothing.
When I look at the polls, I am 49%.

As the sun sets over the Yellow River and the moon rises in the China Sea,
I reach to the stars with both hands
knowing I will be on American TV.

Campus Housing

By EDWIN MATYSIEWICZ

This year is probably the beginning of an era of fiscal difficulty for UMass (forecasted for higher education by Newsweek). Campus housing which is a service, operates with very marginal reserves unable to absorb large increases. The Sylvan area and a 90% occupancy rate have resulted in a revenue deficit of over $300,000. This means $300,000 of revenue did not materialize in dormitory accounts because of low occupancy. Therefore, if spending is continued at its present rate, housing will be $300,000 in the red in the expense Budget at the end of the semester.

The revenue budget was calculated on a occupancy rate of 95% as is university policy. However, the base number of beds included two in a counselor's room and beds in rooms which have been taken out of service (snack bars, dark rooms, etc.) Therefore a more realistic base number for the revenue budget calculation must be adopted. In fact, the 95% rate has not been achieved for several years.

The 90% occupancy rate has several causes. Recent relaxation of off-campus housing eligibility rules has made off-campus housing available to more students. The relative high cost of on campus housing of $70/month for half a dormitory cubicle is very unattractive when compared to sharing an apartment at the same or usually lower cost. The choice for the eligible student is easy, off-campus housing is just a simply better buy at this time. As on-campus housing costs continue to rise, more students will move off-campus and then on campus housing will have to again raise rents to compensate for lower occupancy rates. This vicious cycle will be further aggrevated next year by the University accepting 1800 junior and senior transfers from Community Colleges. Many of these transfers will automatically be eligible for off campus housing, and will probably exercise this option once they realize what off-campus housing offers in relation to on-campus housing.

The other major fiscal disaster is Sylvan area. The actual costs far exceeded the projected construction costs and as a result the rent does not cover the bills for the area. Presently deficits in the Sylvan area will be supported by transfers of money from Southwest projects with agreement of the building authority.

The on-campus housing picture is very gloomy and doesn't look as if it will become any brighter. One large cost area which is constantly rising is PP (Physical Plant) services. (janitorial, maintenance, and rennovation). Presently the services are done by University employees which are relatively costly. For example, a person that gets paid $2.50/hour, with fringe benefits added, costs physical plant $3.20/hour. Then with the usual 38% surcharge by PP, actual billed labor costs to dormitories is $4.32/hour.

The relative high cost of PP services as in the example of $4.32/hour in comparison to the cost of student labor hired by the business manager at $1.75/hour is very high, almost three times as much.

There is not only the high cost of PP services, but also there is a problem of PP management. Presently when maintenance is done in dorms, area business managers cannot supervise or oversee the work as is current management practice in many colleges. Now when questions of job progress arise with the present management structure, area business managers are helpless to reduce man-hour waste. What we have now is a PP personel supervisor in each dorm area. Currently when a PP supervisor becomes too friendly with the students or people in the area director's office, he gets switched to another area as part management practice so he won't "stagnate". This present management system is a large contributor to the housing problem. Maintenance supervisors who report directly to business managers would mean more efficient management.

In Canadian Colleges it is common practice to hire students for janitorial, maintenance, and rennovation of campus facilities. Several collages in the U.S. are similarly run with good results. (ie Harvard). I believe that campus housing could and should be cheaper. In light of decreased financial aid (7%) for students, I believe that more service jobs should be done by students. I would appreciate campus comment.

Letters

As in previous years the MDC will continue to print letters to the editor. The only requirements are that they be typed at sixty spaces, double-spaced and absolutely no longer than two pages in length. All letters must be signed and the author's address and telephone numbers must be included. No letter will be published without this information. Also, no letters will be printed without the name of the author. Please note this change in policy.

All letters are subject to editing either for content or space according to the judgment of the editors. Also, due to space limitations, we do not guarantee that all letters will be printed.

Letters To The Editor

Sportive Profits For The Amateur

To the Editor:

In reading Mr. Derderian's column, "On Amateurism" (Wednesday, Feb. 23), I was both amazed and dismayed at not only his rather vague and confusing beginning, but also at the conclusions and recommendations he makes. First, the title of the column is "ON Amateurism", and yet the word is only mentioned once throughout the entire article, and even this is in no way connected to any definition, which is ultimately the crux of his whole article, as much as he'd like to think it isn't. The article primarily deals with trying to distinguish between "commercialism" and professionalism", a strange way indeed to discuss "amateurism".

Secondly, Mr. Derderian seems to want to have his cake and to eat it also, in his definition of "professionalism", as it appears to combine the best of both the amateur and professional aspects of sport. The idea of an athlete being both an amateur and a professional at once in the same event is mind boggeling, to say the least.

Finally, Mr. Derderianexplains that the best, indeed the only way to keep the athletes from being "exploited", or "Slave labor in Sapporo", is to employ "profiteering". To accomplish this, he suggests seven policies that might be instituted to achieve this goal. I should like to give my own thoughts on these proposals. Mr. Derderian states that "excessive prize money for extraordinary competitions" should be prohibited. Would he care to tell us what excessive money or an extraordinary the stunt, the more money an individual should receive for it. (Anyway, the government has prohibited Mr. Kneivel from attempting his jump of the Grand Canyon anyway, so why worry about it, unless one is embarrassed because Mrs. Kneivel is getting more for his feat than someone who runs a hundred yards or jumps a bar?). Mr. Derderian than comes to the crux of his position, namely profit sharing by the athletes. This is all well and fine, but does he realize that athletes salaries are already the largest single items on most professional budgets? Also, he seems to think that all teams are even making money-does he realize that this is not even close to being true (example- about only four or five basketball teams in the NBA are turning a profit, the rest, no way); in all fairness, if the athletes share in the profits, they also ought to share in the losses, so that if a team loses money, they should pay the team to play. How many athletes, Mr. Derderian, would agree to this?

Mr. Derderian next proposes to legalize gambling, in order to increase turnouts, and then gate receipts. This he feels, will increase the athletes' salaries and they won't fix games any more. I can only ask what basis of proof there is for this chain of thought? Why should anyone be more inclined to attend a game now that it is easier to bet on it? And besides, in the words of Saint Peter Rozelle, "I would hate to see the hometown fans boo the team because it was simply sitting on a lead and run out the clock, and not trying to beat the point spread." Also, if gambling is legal, won't players bet on games like everyone else?

As for cutting the officials in on the profits, don't you think they might be influenced to keep the contest close in order to keep attendance up? Let us not forget that officials are human, also.

Two of Mr. Derderian's last three points concern themselves with placing a tax on tickets to games, to help research on sport and related subjects. Perhaps he has not taken a good look at the last ticket he bought to a Red Sox game, or indeed to a UMass football game, but if so, he will note that there is already a tax being collected, and for perhaps more worthy causes than he suggests. How many taxes would Mr. Derderian like to see added to the price of an athletic ticket? There is only so far one may prices and still hope to sell the maximum number of seats available.

I agree with Mr. Derderian that athletes should be on directing boards in amateur sports, but not to the extent he does (50%), simply because I do not believe they have the expertise to warrant such strong representation.

Finally, I must voice strong disagreement with Mr. Derderian's belief that athletes are exploited or that they have lost "control of their bodies". To admit this, is to admit that athletes have had a gun put to their heads in order to force them to compete, and I would have to question an athlete's true motives if he submitted to this; if an athlete allows himself to be exploited, he has no one but himself to blame.

It's Real

To the Editor:

I was really amazed at how true the article about Belchertown really was. A month ago I could never have imagined how the conditions really were. It's easy to draw a picture in your mind but it will never really be real until you see for yourself. A few weeks ago I started volunteering with a friend of mine who works there as an attendent nurse. Because there were only three attendent nurses (plus a head attendent nurse) out of a possible seven, I worked the entire shift with her. We spent more time as custodians than we did with the patients.

Except for the fact that I was in a women's building, the article described the conditions perfectly. I wish more people could see Belchertown as it really is. Maybe then something would be done about it.

Dollars For Spring

To the Editor:

The Concert Committee has been meeting since the first semester in order to work out a viable plan for a concert to be held in the spring. It will not be possible to hold a ticketed concert (as originally planned), as the administration has declined to accept the responsibilities and liabilities that such an event would cause. However a free concert is feasible. But there is a difference between a ticketed concert and a free one. All the expenses of a ticketed concert would have been covered by the ticket sales. With the free concert, we must have whatever monies we have. At this time, the committee has approximately $8100, which the Student Senate appropriated for our use. After expenses (which aren't as great as they would be for a ticketed concert), we don't have as much money as we would like to have. This is why we have turned to the area governments for financial help. The money that we hope to receive from the governments will probably determine the quality of the groups that we can contract to play. A student poll will appear in the Collegian with the names of groups that we may contract. However, we need money. I urge all students to contact their representatives in area government, and let them know that you support a spring concert. Urge them to donate whatever money they can to the use of the committee. I would also urge the commuters to attend the next general meeting of the commuters (which will be soon), and to let themselves be heard. Whether or not there is a good concert will depend on you in the end. You elected these people to represent you. Please make sure that they do.

Jeff Willner

Support The Concert

To the Editor:

In the course of the past month the Student Senate has appropriated a total of $8112 to be used for a free concert to be held here at the university in the Spring. If you have followed the sequence of events than most o you know why we plan on having a free concert as opposed to a ticketed style admission concert. For those of you who don't know why let me explain briefly. To begin with a free concert is less expensive than ar admission-ticket concert because you don't need the additional security or student marshal or usher staffs. Nor do we have to provide tickets and extensive advertising, etc. There are additional benefits also to be gained by the free concert style some of which are unlimited admissions so that any student, so desiring, could attend as well as the fact that persona injury would be minimized because of the free psychological atmosphere and the lack of a cause that could create hostility and anxiety, etc.

Having reached the decision to provide a free concert the Studen Senate contributed as much as it was financially able to contribute. This however is not sufficient to provide a good all day free spring concert tha would include at least one or two popular feature attractions. We are presently, faced with the problem of generating or obtaining additiona funds. There are a number of areas or means to obtain these additiona funds. The first source that we have attempted to obtain funds from were and presently are all the area governments. Presently, we have en countered many problems with this approach. Orchard Hill's Area Government would like to fund or help fund the concert but they have spent or promised to spend almost all of their entire budget which is a total, as in the case of all other areas, of four dollars per student. South west Assembly have made some gestures of attempting to aid the concer but as of this time have not voted to do so. Central Area is also in favor o funding but have not had a quorum which is necessary to approve the appropriation. Sylvan Area government has not been approached as they are still in the process of forming that government. The Commute Assembly has been asked for an appropriation of $1,500 but they have decided not to fund the Concert and to keep those funds in a "slush" fun for future use or as I am told for a beer blast at the next General Meetin of the Commuter Assembly. I might add that if commuters are interested enough and sincerely desire to have a good concert, they should either come or request the executive committee of that body to hold a meetin at which time a proposal of an appropriation could be made. Any com muter can make a proposal and any commuter can vote at the genera meeting. Finally, we have not as of yet approached the Northeast Are Government, but I assume that they too have a financial crunch.

And so we have several opportunities. One chance is to charge a dolla for a ticket. Another possibility is to ask for contributions. Both of thes will take great efforts. Please, IF YOU, THE STUDENTS OF THI UNIVERSITY, WANT A FREE CONCERT, GET OUT TO YOUR ARE GOVERNMENTS OR HELP WITH PERSONAL CONTRIBUTIONS THANK YOU FOR YOUR COOPERATION.

Oh, Inflation Again

To the Editor:

Oh, the cost of inflation! With the entire nation experiencing ou sickened system of economics, we find it easier to sympathize wit faculty and staff position freezes, yet the recent stoppage of student dormitory refurbishing monies already appropriated through ren revenue leaves us only with revulsion.

It's been quite a while now since the budgetting procedures fo dispersing some $33,000 allocated to Orchard Hill for improving ou dormitories began. We regret that expenditures involving the UMas Physical Plant have been sluggish in evolving. Notwithstanding whatever the rationale for this freeze, we maintain that an mismanaging or blundering of the budgetting should not result i penalization of our student body. Moreover, we maintain that as th source of refurbishing revenue, the students have every right to spen these monies for student-designated purposes at student-designate times. The freeze, therefore, we consider to be dissonant with thes rights.

The clandestine posture taken by our budgetting staff is particularl distressing. Indeed, our staff communication system appears rathe bleak when the only information line between the Area East Busines Office and the nerve center of Orchard Hill has grapes on it.

We, of Orchard Hill, sense the entire campus in a budgetary dilemm and consequently have called a general meeting at the Webster Hous Lounge at 7:00 Thursday night to find out why we won't be able to resolv this situation.

WFCR To Broadcast Amnesty Hearings

By BILL DENSMORE

This morning from 10:30 AM to 12:30 PM, and Tuesday morning from 9:30 AM to 12:30 PM, WFCR (fm) will broadcast live from Washington, D.C. the Senate subcommittee hearings on amnesty for draft evaders. WFCR (fm) is the public radio station of the Five College community, and broadcasts on a frequency of 88.5 Mc.

Witnesses scheduled to testify during the two days of hearings chaired by Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) today include: Draft Director Custis Tarr, Jack Shattuck of the American Friends Service Committee, and Arlo Tattum, author of The Conscientious Objector's Handbook and member of the Central Committee for Conscientious Objectors.

When the hearings continue Tuesday witnesses will include: David Harris, husband of folk singer Joan Baez and recently released from prison as a draft evader; Sen. Robert Taft (R-Ohio); and Henry Commanger, Professor of History at Amherst College. When reached last Friday afternoon Prof. Commanger indicated that he would urge in his testimony Tuesday "complete amnesty without any conditions" in order to "rid ourselves of these running sores".

"There is still quite a gap between working here and in industry," Petoniak said. "It takes time to again train the person for a specific job and get his productivity up."

Everyone in Petoniak's program lives at home. They must have someone to give them limited care and attention, but the home situation does not encourage independence. Parents eventually die.

The death or disability of a parent usually means Belchertown, even if the person is employed, the result of training and years of learning to live in the world.

Petoniak plans an experimental "boarding house" approach to community living. Cooking and other needs will be taken care of by "house parents," who will also provide the needed amount of supervision.

Dr. M. Phillip Wakstein, former regional director of retardation for the Department of Mental Health, is a strong advocate of group homes.

"They've been a hell of a success in Connecticut," he said. "The department there is now working on a 28-unit apartment complex in the Hartford area and have several others in operation."

Most of the costs of these homes have been borne by the retarded residents themselves. They contribute a portion of their earnings for rent and food. The state hires and trains the "house parents" and any other staff needed. It also provides any other services which may be necessary.

Such complexes could be constructed new and paid for with the savings of costs as compared to Belchertown — about $1,000 per year for the homes compared to $3,800 for Belchertown.

Legislative appropriations, or lack thereof, are again the cause of the lack of such centers and workshops. The appropriations are also the cure.

With the overcrowded conditions at Belchertown and an increasing population (more retarded persons) new facilities will have to be constructed at some time.

Dr. Gunnar Dybwad, a consultant to the President's Committee on Mental Retardation and a world-renowned expert, says group homes can be constructed for about half of the "hospital-type" institutional construction costs.

Dybwad suggest modified houses with about eight residents each, possibly in clusters. He points to a state school under construction near Chicago which is using this cottage paln for its entire layout, not for group homes.

He has pictures of homes in Seattle for the adult retarded, located in the community, which would be the pride of any architect or homeowner, modern homes anyone would be proud to live in.

Two persons usually share the rooms there, with built-in Danish type bunks which convert to sofas for daytimeuse. There is a central living room and kitchen, with baths shared by the residents.

Scandinavia, Dybwad says, presently has the world leadership in treatment of the retarded. They have many such group homes scattered throughout the various countries, with small equivalents of our "state schools" located within cities and towns.

"The people are treated here like any human being, as normal as his condition would permit," he said. "There is not the stigma attached to retardation that there is here. The retarded are allowed to come and go as they please, even marry and have children.

"The government even teaches birth control. More importantly, the retarded people can learn birth control."

He contrasted the buildings with Belchertown, an institution whose conditions he finds shocking.

Scandinavia and Seattle have brightly colored walls, simple but attractive furniture, curtained rooms, privacy, and people who care. The retarded have individual or shared rooms not a single dormitory with beds crowded together in a sea.

Meals, he said, are usually prepared in the units and provide a variety, not fixed in a central kitchen and shipped in to the individual units in quantity.

The difference, he points out, is that Scandinavia, Seattle, and soon the Chicago complex treat the retarded as human beings. They are not warehoused like cattle because of a lack of money. Nor are they denied living like human beings by a legislature which pinches pennies on care and squanders millions because the care is substandard and self-perpetuating.

Tomorrow: At Belchertown, fire escapes are locked and there are no sprinkler systems.

Panel To Discuss China Policy

Featured this week in the UMass Great Decisions program is "Our China Policy: How Far and How Deep the Thaw?"

The forum will be broadcast live over radio WFCR (88.5 F.M.) Wednesday, March 1, at 7:30 p.m. from the Noah Webster HHouse Lounge, UMass.

Luther A. Allen, UMass associate professor of political science, is moderator. Panelists include Franklin W. Houn of the UMass political science department; Barry Keenan, Mt. Holyoke College history department; and Ray Moore, Amherst College history department.

Pamphlet materials are prepared for these weekly sessions by the Foreign Policy Association, an organization founded in 1918 to inform the public on international efforts. The materials are available in the Webster House Library weekday evenings for persons wishing to participate in the live audience broadcasts each week.

Apple Corps, a student group from the Orchard Hill residence complex, sponsors the series.

Action Reps Here Today

Representatives of the new agency, ACTION, which includes Peace Corps and VISTA, will make their Spring semester visit to UMass on February 28 and 29 and March 1 and 2 in spite of the fact that Peace Corps' budget has been severely cut by Congress.

"Late last week we finally got the word, after almost two months of waiting, that Congress has given Peace Corps $72 million to operate on this fiscal year," said Seth Kurn, an ACTION representative.

In December, when Peace Corps was threatened with the possibility of having to live with a budget this size (the original request was for $82.2 million), the Director said that the only way this was possible was to bring home about half of the volunteers early and cut completely programs in 15 of the 55 countries.

"Without getting into all the accounting reasons, this cut is a lot larger than it seems," said Kurn, who claims that the agency faces the equivalent of a $30 million reduction between now and June 30.

The representative says the only way to absorb a cut of this size is to pull back a lot of people. "Other Federal agencies do it on paper, reducing things like contracts and so on, but we have to do it with people."

With these cuts, why is Peace Corps trying to recruit people at UMass this week? Kurn says that people who apply now will not be affected by this budget cut.

"It may seem strange that we're telling people to join at the same time that we're bringing people home," said Kurn, who went on to say that the budget problem is a temporary one.

"I'm not a budget planner and I can't think like one, but as I understand it, we have to make up the difference between now and the end of this fiscal year, or June 30. Next year, because we're a part of ACTION, we'll have our own budget and not get messed up in foreign aid appropriations."

Ironically, the proposed budget cut for Peace Corps comes at a time when enthusiasm for volunteer programs, both Peace Corps and VISTA, is beginning to show again on the college campuses.

Kurn said that ACTION recruiting efforts last semester were more successful than any in the previous five years.

Joining Kurn at UMass will be George Ulbrich, Ginger Getman, Travis Gamble, and Bill Brown. The representatives are especially interested in talking to students with majors in education, math/science, agriculture, home economics, business, and civil engineering, although students with other skill backgrounds are also encouraged to stop by the booth in the Campus Center from 9 to 4 any of the four days.

Debate Team Successful

The UMass Debate Team did well in a national tournament held last weekend at Harvard University.

Karin Kramer, Celia Hooper, Dave McCaffrey, and Paul Lamarche competed against the best teams from over 100 schools across the nation. By the end of the weekend, Kramer and Hooper had defeated teams from the University of North Carolina, Wake Forest, McNeese State, and West Point, going 4-4.

Meanwhile McCaffrey and Lamarche came within one ballot of winning a trophy with a fine 5-3 record. They beat teams from the University of Pennsylvania, West Georgia, St. John's, Auburn, and Emerson.

Juniors Bruce Murphy and John Day traveled to Bowling Green U. in Ohio, to be one of the DSR*TKA National Honor fraternity representatives in competition with rival Pi Cap fraternity teams. Both are debate fraternities and the results were that DSR*TKA won again as in past years.

Members of the novice team were away at Kings College in Pennsylvania. There Richard LeBlanc, Mark Dunn, Ed Pepyne, and Denny Keyes prepared themselves for future novice competition by debating on the varsity level.

Radical Studies Group Formed

A "Joint Radical Studies Group of Orchard Hill and Project 10" has been formed by a group of UMass students and faculty from both residential areas.

The group has been created out of the desire to have a more organized and coordinated set of course offerings, action programs, speaker programs, and other activities, to bring together radical students and faculty, and to provide an alternative to the "mass training program" at the University.

The program is now only in its formative stage, but already a number of plans have been made for Fall, 1972. First, the group is going to create some of its own courses, which will be basic seminars in radical politics and a foundation for further study.

Next fall two three-credit seminars will be offered: "Beyond Corporate Capitalism" and "Twentieth-Century Socialist Revolutions." Besides these basic seminars, the Radical Studies Group will offer a number of courses next fall, including Radical Perspectives in Law; Radical Psychology; Literature and Society; Black Perspectives; Ethics; The Military-Industrial Complex; Introduction to Economics, and others.

Also there will be an evening colloquium of speakers and films on areas of interest to radicals, and a colloquium of speakers and films on areas of interest to radicals, and a colloquium in guerilla theatre, both of which will be ways in which students can earn University credit.

Third, the group intends to help students find other courses of interest to them by publishing a list of all courses to be given at Project 10, the Orchard, or anywhere else on campus or in the area, that will contribute directly to education in a radical perspective.

The question of how to define "education in a radical perspective" is to be answered democratically by all members of the Radical Studies Group in ongoing discussion, with equal participation of students and faculty.

For further information about the Radical Studies Group contact Allen Davis at the Masters' Office in Orchard Hill, or Charles Adams or Dave Hoffman at Project 10. People are needed to help with organizational work, suggestions for activities and courses to include in the program, and information about courses we should publicize on our lists.

A general meeting of the Radical Studies Group is being held Friday, March 3, at 4:00, in Eugene Field Lounge. Plans and policies will be discussed, and beer will be served.

Food Services

Students Test Taste Food

By JON SNOW
BETSY PEET

In the first article written about the University Food Service Department, the many opportunities a student has to actively participate in the improvement of Food Service were stated. The last article described the functions of the recently organized Marketing Division of Food Service and in this article another possibility for a student to become involved in the development of Food Service is going to be described - The Food Test Panel.

The philosophy behind the Test Panel is to try as many new products as possible. Then, either new items can be put on the menu for more variety, or new products will replace those presently being used in the Dining Commons. This Taste-Test Panel is open to any student who wishes to attend.

To be a participant in the Test Panel is very simple. Either sign up on a list posted in one or two of the dining commons or come to the third floor of Worcester Commons, and leave your name at least one day prior to the panel. The Test Panel is held twice a week, on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons at two o'clock.

Being a student participant on last Thursday's Test Panel was a lot of fun and quite interesting. Twelve students and five staff members comprised the panel. Each of us was served a small portion of nine items.

For each item the participant filled out an evaluation form and rated the product on a scale from extremely like to extremely dislike, according to appearance, texture, tenderness, flavor and overall opinion. In addition to that, comments were written and the participant stated whether he felt that particular item should or should not be served in the dining commons.

After all the items were tasted, coffee and cake were served. The items on the Test Panel, complaints about the food, and procedures of the dining commons were discussed. The Test Panel lasted approximately one hour.

The Food Test Panel is one of the best opportunities a student has to help develop and improve the University Food Service Department. A student also has a chance to meet with managers of the various divisions of Food Service and discuss the problems that exist. You (the student) have an obligation to yourself and the university community to aid in the improvement of the University Food Service Department.

Team Teaching Tested

The Advanced Learning Group in School Administration visited the Rockland Junior High School (Rockland, Massachusetts), to observe an innovative education program in Team Teaching and Team Governance.

The teaching staff and administration of the Rockland Junior High School launched a comprehensive team teaching and team governance program last September. Each team is staffed by four major subject area teachers and an intern, with each team supported by the special subject teachers. There are approximately one hundred thirty-five (135) students in each team, assigned to their respective teams alphabetically and heterogeneously. The teams plan their own programs, do their own scheduling, carry out their own discipline and generally function as five schools within a school. The team leaders assist the building principal in the administration of the school.

The purpose of the visit is explained to the students to solicit their candid appraisal of the new Team Teaching program at Rockland Junior High School.

'Reformation' At Smith

"Changing Pictures of the Reformation" will be the topic of a lecture to be given at Smith College by Jaroslav Pelikan, professor of religious studies at Yale University.

The lecture, to be Tuesday (Feb. 29) at 8 p.m. in Wright Hall, is open to all interested persons.

Mr. Pelikan, a graduate of Concordia Seminary, received his Ph.D. in 1946 from the University of Chicago, where he taught from 1953 to 1962. In 1962, he was named the Titus Street Professor of Ecclestiastical History at Yale University, and last year became professor of religious studies there.

Wanted: Nixon's Panda Bears

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

A pair of giant panda bears may well turn out to be the most-wanted item President Nixon brings back from Peking. The clamor from zoos offering the animals a home is increasing.

The Brookfield Zoo in Chicago says it should get the pandas because of its central location and because it had the last pandas ever seen in the United States. The last one died in 1953.

The Honolulu Zoo says it should get the pandas because they eat bamboo and Honolulu has more bamboo than any other zoo. Besides, the zoo says, it's got a Chinese keeper to tend the huge bears, native to China.

The National Zoo in Washington, D.C., says it has tradition on its side. The zoo, says a spokesman, "has been the repository for more than 80 years of such gifts from other nations."

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

by SYDNEY OMARR

Leo and Aquarius can vie with each other when it comes to embellishing stories. Nothing simple seems to occur with these natives. Going shopping can turn into an adventure where Leo or Aquarius are involved. Members of those zodiacal signs can tell a story, can write and create and often get themselves "emotionally tangled" because they want to "see what will happen." Leo and Aquarius can have boisterous times together--but staying together --but staying together is not exactly an easy matter.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Full moon position and aspects spotlight your work, ability to communicate. Tendency now is for others to misquote you. Make position clear. Outline plans. Get promises in writing. Check fine print.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You require new understanding with family, associates. Quarrels swirl around you. Be skillful enough to express view in calm manner. Then you emerge with greater prestige. Libra person is involved.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Many avenues may appear blocked. Key is to see realistically. Delay need not be regarded as setback. Avoid any tendency to fool yourself. Property should be appraised. Then do some double-checking.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be aware of rights and permissions. One who has had experience can properly advise you. Avoid forming conclusions based on impulse. Relatives, neighbors could be quarrelsome. Delay short trip.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Financial affairs need appraisal. Take inventory. Get rid of deadwood. Refuse to be possessed by possessions. Special relationship is put to test. Individual with childish notions makes shrill demand.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Break loose. Means find outlet for creative expression. You get chance to be more independent in thought, action. Original ideas succeed. Those in positions of authority may disagree. But you will benefit.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Teach and learn--get off sidelines and into game. Means assert yourself. All may not agree, but you ultimately make favorable impression. Disregard pessimism of some neighbors and relatives.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Stress versatility. Obtain hint from Libra message. Broaden horizons. Imprint your own style. Friends who argue may try to involve you. Sense of humor can become great ally. Don't take sides.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Use imagination in constructive manner. Don't brood. You get what you want if approach is thorough--and you are dedicated. Don't bluff. Say what you mean--mean what you say. Aquarian is involved.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Full moon emphasizes travel and crystallization of ideas. Some concepts will be discarded. Don't block progress. Know that change now is beneficial. Gemini and Virgo persons figure prominently.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You benefit now through association with Sagittarius. Investment procedure needs review. Stress diplomacy. Money comes from unorthodox source. Family ties can be strengthened. Be receptive.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Don't force issues. Maintain low profile. You do best now by listening and observing. Avoid extremes. Be wary in dealing with one associated with law. Take nothing for granted. Let others show their hands.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are sensitive, independent, a creative thinker. Most significant month this year could be April. You are attractive to opposite sex--and you love to be flattered. Many claim you are impossible to really know. At times, you agree. You simply are not going to be satisfied with status quo--and that may be all to the good.

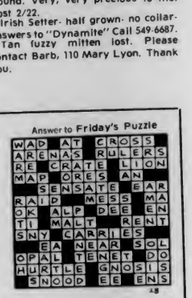
PICTURE YOURSELF AS A PAULIST.

First, picture a religious Community. A Community founded by an American convert in, and for, the benefit of North America.

Picture a founder who was a century ahead of his time. A man with a vision that came true. A man with a belief that a Community could be modern and flexible enough to meet the needs of the Church in every age as they arise. A Community that wouldn't lag behind the times on leaden feet. A Community that would communicate through the spoken and printed word and one that wouldn't be hampered by specific activities when new needs arise.

Next, picture the men in this new Community. They would be flexible. Each one would use his own individual talents in his own way and would be given the freedom to do so.

These are the Paulists. The modern religious Community. Keeping pace with the times. Concerned. Involved.



If you can picture yourself as a Paulist, why not write for more information to: Rev. Donald C. Campbell, C.S.P., Vocation Director, Room No. 400

Gymnasts Trek To Temple

By JANE CROOK

The UMass Varsity Gymnastics team and their loyal vociferous following will make the six hour trek to Philadelphia today for their last dual meet of the 1971-72 season. Tomorrow night at 7:30 p.m. the Redmen will take on Temple University in a decisive meet that could very well determine both teams' final placing in the Eastern League. A win at Temple means at least a tie for second in the East for UMass, depending of course on a performance of equal calibre at the Easterns later in March.

Coming off of an exciting 155.4-153.8 win over Navy, the Redmen should have the edge at Temple, but, one!

Temple is one of the four eastern teams, along with UMass, Springfield, and Navy, all crowded around second place, all scoring within a point of each other. So far this season, Temple's highest score has been 154.1, compared to UMass' high of 155.4 last Saturday. But a team that is potentially better on paper can't rely on mere potential to win the close meets.

Temple currently holds a 5-1 league record, losing only to might Penn. State, but its win over Springfield is deceiving. It came on an extremely off day for Springfield, as they only managed to score 146. UMass rides into Temple sporting a 6-2 record, their losses coming at the hands of Penn. State and Springfield.

The Temple gymnasts appear to be a well-balanced team, without any particular sensational events, but with three solid all-around men in Mel Hill, Dennis Siedel, and Blane Nasveschuk. Junior Mel Hill is especially good on floor and vaulting. From a team perceptive, floor and high-bar look to be their strongest events, while specialist- wise Rich Tobin and Mark Musy will bolster the Owl line-up. Musy will work rings, p-bars, and high bar, while Tobin will pace the floor team.

Leading the Redmen Tuesday will be co-captains Dave Genest and Tony Vacca. This is the last dual meet for Genest and Vacca, as well as three other senior specialists on the team; John Calabria, Tom Myslicki, and Len Aubrey. Vacca will work the all-around, along with Steve Scuderi. Basically, UMass will go with the same specialist line-up that scored 155.4 against Navy. We'll be relying on strong routines from John Calabria and Jack Berner on floor, Steve Nelson and Rich Seikunas on sidehorse, Jay Aronstein, John Oliver and Danny Spies on rings, Jay Thompson in vaulting, Dave Genest on p-bars, and Tom Myslicki on high bar.

Event for event, the middle section of the meet looks to be critical. Floor Exercise will be a toss-up, both teams averaging in the mid-26's. Pommel horse will be close, too, both sidehorse teams being somewhat erratic, scoring in the mid-24's. Temple tends to have a weak ring team, scoring in the low 24's compared to our low 25's, so this is the place where we'll have to pick up those valuable extra tenths. The second half will be another nerve-racking and tight one for the Redmen. Both teams have good vaulters, and are very evenly matched on parallel bars and high bar, making the outcome impossible to predict.

It appears to be another one of those meets where every score will be important, and the hitting percentage will be crucial, because a serious break anywhere could blow it. either team is capable of winning on Tuesday. The team that shows the most consistency and depth will emerge the victor.

Sanderson Censors Self

BOSTON (AP) — Derek Sanderson, the modish star center of the Boston Bruins, has had his less-than-one-minute part in a X-rated film deleted from showings in the United States.

The film "Loving and Laughing" has been a hit in Montreal where it is being shown with Sanderson's part included. It is scheduled to open here Wednesday, but at Sanderson's request, without the segment showing him.

The segment shows Sanderson going to a rock party claiming to be a scout for a girls' hockey team.

Maurice Attias, associate producer and public relations man for the film, said, "Sanderson's part is not the least bit offensive. But, the movie itself is a controversial one, and I think that Derek had second thoughts about appearing in it."

The filming of Sanderson's part was done in one day in Montreal in Augusta, 1970, when he was in a salary dispute with the National Hockey League team.

He reportedly received a four-figure salary for his work in the film.

"He impressed me as a quiet, serious student who showed great interest in his work," Attias said.

"He got along extremely well with everyone in the set and became close friends with the star Andre Lawrence.

"He is more interested right now in continuing his hockey career as opposed to becoming an actor But he did say he had a lot of fun on the set and felt he had acting talent," Attias said.

Intramural News

By GEOFFREY KURINSKY

Intramural Sports and Activities developed as an outgrowth of student interest, and this interest is proven in the large number of participants involved in the programs.

The 11th annual Intramural Wrestling Tournament is underway with more than 260 participants competing for titles in nine weight classes. The action began on Tuesday, February 22, and will culminate with the championship matches on March 2.

Defending champion, and winner three of the last four years, Phi Mu Delta will face stiff competition from among the 30 units representing the Fraternities, Residence Halls and Independent teams, who will be trying to grapple the team title away from them. The fraternities have always fared well in this event having won all seven team titles that have been awarded.

In the 197 pound category, James Brown of the Butterfield Lemons will be vieing for an unprecedented third straight individual title. Brown took the 187 pound class in 1970 and outclassed the field in the 197 pound last year. Two other defending champions will be back trying to repeat, both in higher weight categories this time. Robert Parent of The Team, defending champion in the 128 will be competing in the 137 pound grouping. Jason Kantor of the Chadbourne Maroons will be wrestling in the 177 pound class-he took the 167 last time around. Last year's runner-up in the 128, Mike Leffler, will be looking for all the marbles in that event this time around.

The preliminary matches are being held in the Boyden Wrestling Gym and the Auxiliary Gym. The finals on Thursday will be held in the Auxiliary Gym.

Volleyball is the most popular intramural activity on the campus With more than 210 teams participating in Men's, Women's, and Co-Rec action the number o students participating number over 2000. Preliminary matche are presently going on with championship matches schedule within two weeks.

Conigliaro Will Not Attempt Comeback

NAHANT, Mass. (AP) — Tony Conigliaro went into seclusion in Connecticut Thursday after an eye examination confirmed that his sight is too poor to try a baseball comeback, according to his brother, Billy.

Conigliaro, once considered a budding superstar with the Boston Red Sox, said his baseball career is over, according to a story in Friday's editions of the Los Angeles Times.

"I feel I'm nothing without baseball, but this time I can't fight it," the Times quoted Conigliaro as saying. "I've been through two comebacks already and I can't do it again."

He was hit in the head in a 1967 game by a pitch thrown by Jack Hamilton of the California Angels. He missed the entire 1968 season.

He came back in 1969 with nearly normal eyesight and had two more good seasons with the Red Sox before being traded to the Angels just before last season.

He never was able to pull out of a season-long hitting slump, and on July 10 announced at a dawn news conference that he was retiring, saying, "I'm losing my sight and am on the verge of losing my mind."

Billy said from the family home in Nahant Friday, "He went in the hospital yesterday...They said his eye was the same as it was last July."

Billy, traded from the Red Sox to the Milwaukee Brewers after the 1971 season, said his brother wanted to concentrate on business activities.

Dr. Charles Regan of the Massachusetts Eye and Ear Infirmary said Thursday's examination revealed that the vision in Conigliaro's left eye was only 20-100, compared to 20-30 in 1970.

Conigliaro told the Times that Reagan's report said in part, "There is no indication he can play baseball more effectively now than he did last July."

Talk Of Erving Jumping To NBA

NEW YORK—The National and American Basketball Association talent war may cost the ABA another of its prize rookies.

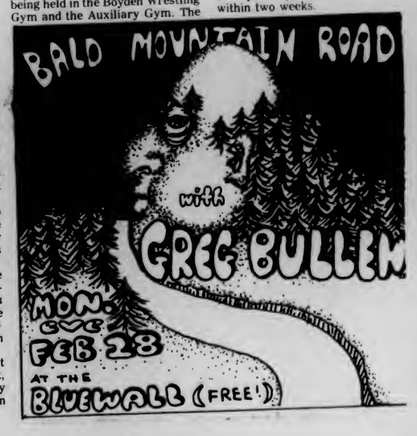
Julius Erving of the Virginia Squires is the latest in a group of pro and college players caught in the bidding war as the planned merger between the leagues remains at a standstill.

Erving, unhappy with his four-year $500,000 contract that is spread over a seven-year span, has switched negotiation representatives. He has asked Earl Foreman, the Squires' owner, to renegotiate a new contract, "For a lot more money." The 22-year-old Erving admitted he has been contacted by several NBA teams.

Erving left the University of Massachusetts after his junior season to join the ABA. Walter Kennedy, commissioners of the NBA, said Erving and Ralph Simpson of the Denver Rockets, will be eligible for the April 10 college senior draft since their classes will graduate in June. Simpson dropped out of Michigan State two years ago and signed with the Rockets.

Erving, who attended Roosevelt, N.Y. High School was one of the nation's leading college scorers and rebounders at Massachusetts. He is a leading contender for ABA rookie of the year honors. He is averaging 26 points a game.

Bob Woolf, the Boston sports lawyer, represented Erving in his contract negotiations with the Squires. Last Sunday Erving switched to Irwin Wiener, the 39-year-old manager of Walt Frazier Enterprises, a company that handles many athletes, including Archie Clark and Mike Riordan of the Baltimore Bullets.



"I was naive when I decided to turn pro. I didn't know much about contract negotiations and my college coach (Jack Leaman) recommended Bob. I'm happy playing with the Squires, but the life of a pro athlete is a short one and after hearing about the money that is being tossed around, I don't think my contract is a fair one. I have proven myself and I don't think I'm being paid the market value for the type of player I think I am. I deserve considerably more money. My contract needs restructuring so that I can receive more money now."

Would Erving be willing to jump to the NBA if he were drafted and his contract demands were unresolved? NBA representatives have talked with me," said Erving. "I'm willing to wait and see what happens in the draft and what comes of it. If I should get a solid offer with protection and security, I would weigh jumping."

When Erving was reminded his present contract with the Squires had three years remaining, he said, "That remains to be seen. I will be watching the outcome of Jim McDaniel's case very closely."

McDaniels jumped from the Carolina Cougars of the ABA to the Seattle Supersonics of the NBA, two weeks ago. The former Western Kentucky 7-footer expressed unhappiness with his 1.5 million contract that was spread over a 25-year span. He continues to play with the Sonics while his case is in the courts.

Redmen Six Edge Hamilton

By TOM PLANT

The UMass Redmen hockey team won their sixteenth game of the season Saturday afternoon at Orr Rink as they barely defeated the Hamilton College Continentals by a score of 3-1.

The game turned out to be an exciting showdown of goaltending talents between the Continental's Greg Root and P.J. Flaherty. Each netminder matched the other with spectacular saves throughout the game, excepting one slow reaction by Flaherty early in the first period accounting for Hamilton's only tally.

The first few minutes of the opening period revealed the frustration that the Redmen would suffer at the hands of the Hamilton junior goalie. On successive partial breakaways, Root stubbornly stood his ground and stifled the shots off the sticks of the starry-eyed Redmen. And then, at 3:55, Hamilton's Rick Santa passed from the left face-off circle to Dave Gillmore behind the Redmen net. Gillmore passed the puck out front to freshman John Hutchins, who snuck it past the surprised Flaherty. Flaherty has been hampered in the past couple of games with a sprained ankle, and on that first goal, some excuse was necessary. That was the only scoring in the first period as the Redmen could not get anything going due to some excellent forechecking by Hamilton.

At 1:25 of the second stanza, Dan Reidy was finally able to penetrate the goaltending of Greg Root, as he slammed a rebound home from in close, with assists going to Jack Edwards and Dennis Grabowski, to tie it at 1-1. Grabowski, who had been suffering from stomach ailments, did a fine job of filling in for Pat Keenan. The Redmen's leading scorer missed Saturday's game because of an "intent to injure" penalty he incurred in the Boston State game. This penalty carries with it an automatic suspension from the following game.

Again in the first few minutes of the period the Redmen applied great pressure. Jimmy Coleman fed Mike Waldron with a beautiful behind-the-back pass to send Waldron in on a breakaway, only to have Waldron slip and fall before he could get the shot away. Hamilton's Brian Morin came right back with his own breakaway, but P.J. was equal to him and came up with a great save. Hamilton's persistent forechecking controlled the Redmen offense, and forced Flaherty to be outstanding in goal.

With half of the third period gone, it looked as if the "third period doldrums" were back for the Redmen, as they slopped along until the 12:08 mark. There, Hamilton's Dave Gillmore drew a highsticking penalty, and the Redmen turned on their power-play. UMass put tremendous pressure on as the Hamilton defense swarmed around their net desperately trying to keep the Redmen out. Greg Root made incredible saves, one after another. Then at 13:27, Coleman passed to Bob Shilalie at the left point, who fired a slap-shot into the crowd in front of the net. Root made the save, but Bob Bartholomew was there to flip the rebound for the winning goal.

With less than a minute to go, Hamilton tried to get sustained control of the puck so they could pull the goalie. At 19:21, Root skated off to be replaced by an extra forward, but only seconds later the move backfired as Eric Scrafield hit the open net for the clincher, to make it 3-1.

Greg Root had 38 saves in the game, 19 in the third period, and P.J. Flaherty made 21 stops.

The win gives the Redmen a record of 15-3 in Division II, while they are 16-6 overall. On Wednesday night at Orr Rink, the Redmen will play their final regular season game against Division I Providence College, with the J.V.'s in their final outing preceding the Varsity game at 6:15.

Wrestlers Bow In NE's

By JOHN BOCK

New Britain, Conn.-Weekends have not been kind to the UMass wrestling team this year. All six losses came on those weekend away duals or triangulars. Reflecting on this one might consider it an omen or perhaps the omen came in the form of the number of upsets witnessed at the tournament here this weekend.

Wherever the hand that wrote on the wall came from when it stopped it had written that Springfield College had once again taken the NEIWA Tournament trophy home with them. Hes, the Chiefs left no doubts as to who had the best individuals in New England wrestling as they achieved 102-1/2 points for first place while UMass could only manage 83-1/2 for second. This may seem to indicate a rather poor performance on the part of the Redmen until compared with the third place team, URI, who came in with 53-1/2.

Points are achieved in the tournament by advancing men into the finals and by pinning and superior decisions (decisions over ten points). Rounding out the top five were Central Connecticut, the host team, with 47 points and Dartmouth with 43.

The Chiefs were the favored team going into the tournament and came through in good style by taking five of the ten championships. Their top seeded men proved their worth to the Seeding Committee as they moved right through the tourney brackets with ease.

UMass at least came up to expectations of taking second. In so doing, however, the Redmen proved that the days when Springfield could walk into the gym and out the other side with all the trophies are gone. It was a struggle for the Chiefs to win in the finals and they only managed one upset in the tourney.

The tournament was divided into four rounds ranging from quarter finals up to and including finals. The UMass team breezed through the quarter final round losing only one man. John Connolly, after pinning his man in the preliminary round, found out why Estin of Dartmouth was first seeded as he was pinned in 2:32. The rest of the team wrestled very well, bringing in four pin points as they advanced nine men into the semi-final round. It was at this point that the UMass grapplers were ahead of the Chiefs by virtue of the fact that the Chiefs only had seven in the semi's.

The quarter final round provided the tournament with one of the most stunning and unexpected upsets in tournament history, as Gary Sklaver, three-time NEIWA Champ and Most Valuable Wrestler in '71 lost 3-0 to Dartmouth's Conterato. Conterato was unseeded and unknown until he bested Sklaver in a match that was scoreless until the last period for 3 near fall points. This was a big break for UMass 190 pounder Bruce Buckbee, who, as the second seed was expected to wrestle Sklaver in the finals.

The NEIWA Freshman Tourney was in progress at the same time and it was here that the freshman were cleaning up as five out of the seven UMass entered advanced to the finals.

Follow-up tomorrow...

Hoopsters Roll

By EARLE BARROLL

"Senior Night has always been an emotional night for my teams. It's tough for the players to get going, but they've always been successful on this night." -Jack Leaman

For the sixth straight season Jack Leaman's seniors parlayed an emotional pre-game ceremony with the basketball whammy of the Cage to destroy Maine, 100-66, before a final home game crowd of 2800.

This was the last home game for Mike Pagliara, John Betancourt, ChrisCoffin and Rick Vogeley...the pioneers (along with Julius Erving) of the UMass rise to prominance in Eastern basketball circles.

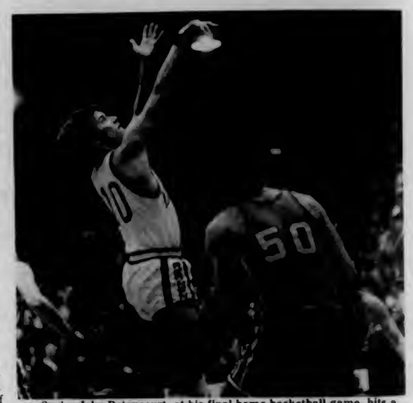
Their coach had this to say about their contributions to the program immediately following the game: "I think this is going to be the end of an unmatched era of basketball here at UMass.

"The program was very low when they came here as freshmen, but they filled the Cage at 5:30 for 6 p.m. freshman games and the program is too strong now for anyone to be able to have the opportunity these players had. They're terrific people and have done more for the program than anyone ever did at UMass. This only proves that when Peter Broaca and I started five years ago recruiting quality kids who were good athletes and would be here for four years we knew what we were talking about.

"Everyone who has been associated with these four, including the players, the fans and the coaches will miss them dearly."

On a night that was set aside as "theirs" the four seniors contributed a great deal toward this Rick Vogeley has his best night of the season with 22 points and 12 rebounds to go along with a mammoth job on the offensive boards. He was forced to play the center position due to a shoulder separation to Charlie Peters sustained in the New Hampshire game which finishes him for the season.

Mike Pagliara and John Betancourt (you just can't separate these two) combined for 24 points and in only 14 minutes including a couple of big ones when the score read 90 and the crowd yelled for more.



Leaman was right when he said his team had troubles getting untracked on this festive night, but thanks to two catalysts known as Peter Trow and Tom Austin the Redmen busted the game open as the first half ended and romped as the second half unfolded.

Trow, who does things that 6'4 guards are not supposed to do (unless you're John Havlicek) like take rebounds away from 6'7 centers or tap in a rebound from under the basket raised total havoc with the Black Bears while he was in there.

Austin's performance was his best since the Quaker City Tourney and he likewise did things he's really not supposed to do like muscle underneath and tip in offensive rebounds for hoops.

But between both their idiosyncracies and the consistency of the seniors, UMass went from a 10-8 lead six minutes into the game to a 36-26 lead at half and then annihilated Maine with a 12-0 burst which busted the Black Bear bubble and sent them back to Orono.

During both these uprisings Maine was crushed up front where their somewhat celebrated front court of Nick Susi, Peter Gavitt and John Sterling (averaging 6'6) was practically non-existent.

Vogeley, Austin, Coffin and Al Skinner (Leaman was extremely pleased with his performance) dominated both boards and it was only the semi-consistent shooting of the Maine backcourt of Paul Bessey and Dan Morrison that enabled Maine to use the Cage scoreboard...and they too were contained by Pagliara, Betancourt and Trow.

Leaman took the seniors out with three minutes to go, but in no time the 100-mark crept into the picture...in came the seniors and moments later after two Coffin sneak-away layups the Cage went beserk with greed for points as the motive.

Skinner went solo down the court for a spinning three-pointer. The only question that remained was whether Trow would get the 100th point as he has done all season. Tom McLaughlin spoiled Trow's quest with two free throws with a few seconds left.

The stage is now set for UMass at Rhody on Tuesday night. The conference title is on the line as both teams have only two losses.

The UMass record is now 14-9, but 9-1 at home which leads Leaman to say, "It amazes me that we play so well at home and so bad on the road and I'm looking for a solution to this problem before Tuesday night at 8."

Frosh Five Win Again

By RICHARD GRIMARD

The Little Redmen won their fourteenth game without a loss Saturday night, as they downed a tough St. Thomas More team, 87-77, at the Cage.

The Freshmen fell behind early and spent most of the first half on the short end of the scoreboard. St. Thomas More's well disciplined offense worked the ball in well for good percentage shots, and their pressing defense forced several Redmen turnovers.

UMass came back to tie the score at 25 behind the hustle of Mike Flanagan and Jim Burke. The teams traded baskets and the half ended in a 34-34 tie.

John Murphy had a poor first half in both scoring and rebounding, but played a strong second half and finished with a game high 28 points.

In that second half the Little Redmen came out running. They built a ten-point lead, which was eventually the winning margin.

Tom Gillams grabbed ten rebounds and scored 11 points to go along with an outstanding all around game. Bill Endicott pumped in 18 points and played his usual tough brand of basketball.

This was the Freshmen's last home game of the season. They have impressed a lot of people and will provide a strong nucleus for next year's varsity team.

Governor Cuts Belchertown Funds

By ROBERT MEDEIROS

Gov. Sargent's recommended budget for the Belchertown State School, representing major cutbacks in funds, projects--a $300,000 cut on the previous fiscal '72 budget--a 40 percent on the requested budget for the fiscal '73 budget.

Hardest hit by the governor's proposed cuts are the student internship and Boltwood programs which may now be abolished unless the necessary funds are restored.

The internship program is aimed at students who are interested in pursuing a vocational form of study at Belchertown. The Boltwood Program is essentially a volunteer program funded by student organizations in the five-college community to assist in the care of patients at Belchertown.

Lee Douchkoff, head of the Boltwood Program--an organization made up of approximately 300 students--termed the governor's action "absurd" and said the cuts would tend to stop student involvement at the school.

UMass Professor Ben Ricci--president of the Belchertown Friends Association and organizer of court action against the State Department of Mental Health--said the governor's decision "flies in the face of the suit" filed against the state.

The class action suit filed by 28 parents in federal court charges that the state has been negligent in the care of patients at the school. Ricci learned of the decision yesterday at the superintendent's weekly meeting, he said.

As Ricci sees it, "The staff at Belchertown was demoralized and is justified in being demoralized at the recommendations."

The cuts by the governor's Office of Finance and Administration will directly affect 40 students in the student internship program. The requested budget made provisions for an increase of 60 students while increasing the number of hours worked by the students from 10 to 20. The governor recommended that all funds in this area be cut.

The Boltwood Program--the majority of students in the program coming from UMass--is indirectly affected in that under the cuts the 10 supervisors, who coordinate the program, would not be paid because of the lack of funds.

Alan Sklover, Amherst College student and one of the 10 Boltwood supervisors said, "Doing away with these funds will do a great deal in the direction of doing away with Boltwood."

The governor's recommendations have touched off renewed protests against conditions and policies surrounding the Belchertown school. In the wake of the governor's proposal, testimony will be heard this Thursday in U.S. District Court in Boston concerning the suit.

The state is not appealing an earlier decision by a federal Judge. The Judge ordered the state to undertake certain steps at Belchertown concerning alleged "inhumane conditions and unjust policies" at the school. Ricci said the parents in the case will block proposed amendments by the state concerning the issuance of a temporary restraining order.

Douchkoff said he will appeal the governor's proposal to the Ways and Means Committee of the state legislature. Ricci said that Dr. Roland Nagle, superintendent of Belchertown, can be expected not to appeal Sargent's decision because of the politics involved in the decision.

In a related development, it was reported that the Parents Association of the Fernald State School were prepared to file legal action against the stage similar to that action filed by the Belchertown Parents Association.

"It just confirms my opinion that we continue to be hypocrites in Massachusetts," continued Ricci. "The governor is going to balance the budget at all costs. He would rather balance the budget than provide humane services for the retarded."

Joseph Sylvia, chairman of Students Offering Support--an organization formed to express support and obtain funds for the Belchertown suit--said, "It is a sad realization to be confronted with the fact that the mentally retarded are once again the victims of politics.

"The system is showing that unless have public support change will not occur," continued Sylvia. "They are not going to do it automatically. This is the way the retarded have always been treated in Massachusetts."

Catching Your Dreams

By MICHAEL PATTERSON

Rev. W. L. Jenkins, pastor of the New Hope Church in Mississippi and president of The National Alliance of Black Americans, will be speaking about the problems of Black students on previously white campuses tonight at 8 in the Student Union Ballroom.

His speech tonight, titled "Catching Up to Your Dreams", will be the last part of a 17-day tour which started at George Washington University in Washington, D.C. Rev. Jenkins has also addressed students at Smith and Mount Holyoke colleges while in this area.

The National Alliance of Black Americans, of which Rev. Jenkins is the head, is a union of college students, high school students, professionals and just everyday people who are tired of being oppressed and want to work for change.

Rev. Jenkins is also the narrator and founder of The Voice of Black America, which is the first radio program of its kind and also the most powerful black programmed station in this country. More than 350,000 Blacks in Mississippi and Arkansas tune in regularly to Rev. Jenkins' program, a talk show supplemented with music, concerned with how Black People relate to the system.

Rev. Jenkins has encountered considerable opposition in his fight against institutionalized racism in this country. He has been threatened and shot at. He was denounced and thrown out of the Methodist Church when he spoke out against exploitation by the bishop of the church members.

The people from this church left with Rev. Jenkins and together they formed the New Hope Church, now one of the largest congregations in Mississippi.

Rev. Jenkins says, "Institutionalized racism has too long denied Black People's rights in this country." He and his organization are doing something about it.

Athletic Council To Meet

The University's Athletic Council will be holding its monthly meeting today at 7 p.m. in Room 223 Boyden. The Council's meetings, which have long taken place in the quiet of the Campus Center's 10th Floor, has been moved to the larger Boyden room to accommodate the expected large student turnout.

Student Senate President Lee Sandwen has invited all interested students to the meeting. At its previous meeting the student turnout partially disrupted the normally calm setting. A large number of students are expected to continue the effort to increase the influence of the Student Body in a program that the Senate have suggested they should control.

The Council will be considering Freshmen eligibility, off-campus scheduling for basketball and hockey, progress on an ice facility, "Recent Emergencies", and its annual tutorial report on student-athletes. The most controversial item will be a discussion of Athletic financial aid based on need, and the recent decision of the Yankee Conference. The Student Senate has endorsed the Yankee Conference action, which some fear will destroy UMass' intercollegiate program.

Chess Team Keeps Championship

In the New England Intercollegiate Chess Championship, held in the Campus Center last weekend, UMass teams took the first two places in a successful defense of their New England title. Finishing first in team competition was UMass "A", consisting of Barry Cohen, Mark Ordung, Rod Stackelberg, and Bob Corwin. The second-place team was UMass "B", including Marty Laine, Mike Stankiewicz, Jim Lane, and Lou Manrique. In singles competition, Cohen's New England championship was wrested from him by Dave Timberlake of Greenfield Community College. Class prizes were won by Ordung, Stackelberg, and Vern Rand of UConn.

Student Senate Committee To Hear Student Gripes

By HUGH OWEN

"We have got to get out of our ivory tower, to come down and better serve the people we represent," said Elliot Sherman.

In hopes of achieving this goal the Student Senate Services Committee will be on the Concourse Level of the Campus Center Thursday, March 2, from 9-5. Vice Chancellors Campion and Gage, and members of the Student Senate Rents and Fees Committee will also be on hand to answer any questions students may have.

Whether it is a problem concerning parking problems or the dime you just lost in the coke machine, everyone is welcome to come and air their gripes. "We want to hear what the students have to say. We will try to answer any questions they have, and the ones we cannot answer we will look into and see what solutions we can come up with," said Sherman.

Sherman went on to say that he expects the main complaints students will have will be concerned with food services, housing, and parking. In anticipation of these problems, steps have already been taken toward finding answers to them.

A committee has been formed to find some solutions to the food services problems. Some suggestions are a five meal ticket, meal tickets which are valid in both dining commons and school run snack bars, and refunds to the students for the meals they did not eat but pay for. The main problem with housing is that many dorms are not fully occupied. One solution is to consolidate students and shut down any dorms that might be left empty. The money which was previously used to keep these empty dorms running can then be used to keep the fees down on the other dorms. Land for a new parking lot has already been graded and will be finished as soon as the necessary money is funded.

Some other services the Services Committee has undertaken are the control of UMass bus transportation and the newly acquired SES notes. In general, they look after any service offered for UMass students.

Complaint boxes have also been set up around the campus so that students can let their complaints be known in this way. These boxes are in places such as Whitmore, Goodell Library, the Campus Center, and resident areas.

Spring Concert Gets Approval

By STEPHEN FISHER

Yesterday afternoon the administration gave their approval to the Spring Concert committee to begin coordinating plans for the concert. Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Robert Gage, Dean of Students William Field, Director of Student Affairs Jerry Scanlon and Director of Security David Johnston met with committee members Elliott Sherman, Bill Staton, Steven Barbanel and Gary Gomes to discuss preliminary plans for the concert.

It was decided at this meeting that the concert will be held in Alumni Stadium during late April or early May. The participating bands will be decided upon by a poll of the student body. The concert will be free, eliminating many security problems that would accompany a ticketed concert.

Estimated costs are as follows:

Entertainment	$ 8,000
Security	2,000
Escrow Bond	1,000
Miscellaneous	1,000
Total	$12,000

The Student Senate will provide $8,100. Area governments will be petitioned for additional funds. If more money is still needed, the committee will rely on coffee houses, small concerts and student donations.

Security inside the stadium will consist solely of student marshalls. Outside the stadium and on the campus uniformed security guards and Campus Police will handle traffic and other problems. They will work for seven hours, including one hour before and after the concert at a rate of $240 per hour for forty officers.

The entire stadium will be used during the concert. It was generally agreed that it would be impossible to keep spectators off the grass on the playing field. Trash barrels will be placed at strategic locations around the grounds in order to keep littering at a minimum. The Student Senate will be held responsible for any damage to the area.

The possibility of holding Spring Day and the concert simultaneously was discussed, but was dropped on the grounds that it would be too difficult to coordinate the two events.

SUG Board At Impasse With Administration

By DON BISHOP

In an action taken two weeks ago, the Student Union Governing (SUG) Board voted by 10 to 2 to delete the veto power of Acting Chancellor Bromery over actions of the Board. The action of the SUG Board indicates the present state of strained relations existing between the Board and the Administration in Whitmore.

While an attitude of mistrust permeates the dealings of the Board, the Management of the Campus Center complex and Whitmore, attempts are being made at this time by both sides to reach some kind of settlement on the issues which have led to the impasse and general feeling of mistrust.

The central issue in this case seems to relate back to a fundamental question of student decision-making and policy power over student funds. The Campus Center building is the only building on campus whose amortization costs (construction costs) are to be paid off by University students. In addition, students, through their Campus Center tax are currently paying roughly 87% of the yearly operational costs of the Campus Center and Student Union.

With the overwhelming majority of funds for the building being supplied by students, it would seem that students would be allowed some measure of directive power over the complex. Here exactly is where the members of SUG Board have come into conflict with the building management and the Administration.

The present officers of the Board: Barry Cohen, Lisa Mandell, and Rick Nelson and Board member Guy Ross have expressed the opinion that SUG Board can do what it wants only so long as management and administration agrees to it, while the management and administration can do what it wants unhindered.

As defined in its constitution, the Duties and Powers of the SUG Board are as follows: The Board shall establish all policies for the Complex and shall communicate all policies to the Campus Center-Student Union Manager or the Coordinator of Activities for the implementation, as appropriate. All action of the Board however, as is also defined in the constitution, is subject to the review and approval of the Chancellor, who at his discretion, may veto any and all actions of the Board, by informing the Chairman of the SUG Board to that effect.

In recent weeks, the Acting Chancellor has exercised this power on a number of occasions, to which the Board in evident frustration, has responded to by attempting to delete this veto power of the Chancellor from the constitution. Cohen, Mandell, Nelson, Ross, and others on the Board feel that the Chancellor has become too arbitrary in his use of this power and they cite cases where they feel that the Acting Chancellor has stepped into the policy making (as defined in the SUG Board Constitution) realm of the SUG Board.

One such incident relates to the Acting Chancellor's veto on February 15th of an action taken by the Board on February 10th in which the Board tried to define "student space" and "management space" in the RSO section of the Campus Center in deciding where to place some recently purchased equipment. The majority of SUG Board members see this particular action of the Chancellor as one which interferes with a strict policy making decision of the Board. The majority do not accept the argument of the Chancellor and other Administrators, that the Board's original decision interferes with the management of the building, and therefore had to be vetoed.

Part of the problem, in addition to the arbitrariness and unaccountability of the Chancellor's veto, according to Secretary-Treasurer Nelson, is what he defined as the "dotted line syndrome." This, according to Nelson, is where the management officials in the building are reporting to (and in certain cases recommending that vetoes of SUG Board bills be made) the Chancellor instead of to the SUG Board, out of whose funds their salaries are paid. He and others on SUG Board feel that theirs is a serious question of responsiveness and accountability to SUG Board on the part of some of the Campus Center management.

The difficulties arising out of the present situation come right down to the questions of how much actual power does SUG Board have at the present time (do they in fact have policy power as defined in their constitution), how much power it can legally have through sanction of the Administration and Board of Trustees, and finally how this question of power can be resolved satisfactorily for both sides and a trustworthy working relationship can be established between the Board, the Management, and the Administration.

Senate Buys S.E.S.

By NATHAN GORENSTEIN

Student Educational Service, (SES) was bought last weekend by the Student Senate for $5,300. The purchase took place at the Hampshire National Bank on Saturday.

SES was bought from George Cheah, a former UMass student. Skip Olmstead, Student Senate Treasurer, said Cheah sold the business because he has moved and is now working in New Hampshire. While Cheah is still head of a corporation called SES he no longer has the rights to the business. All control has been sold to the Student Senate, and the program has been renamed the "Student Senate Lecture Note Program."

Equipment purchased from SES includes a collator, a stitcher, five typewriters and eight cassette tape recorders.

Olmstead will run the program for the remainder of the semester. He foresees no organizational changes in the immediate future, though what will happen next year is still unclear. Frank Baglione, the present manager of the program, will stay on in that capacity.

Skip Olmstead explained that the reasons behind the purchase were threefold. One, that the Senate felt that the service was beneficial to students. Olmstead said that students whom the Senate had talked to "favored the notes."

Second, that SES, not being a student organization, had run into trouble with some professors and the Administration. One professor who SES had approached felt that the service was a "rip-off", while other professors whose classes SES had taken notes on felt that the editing of the notes distributed to their that they type the notes for their own lectures and give them to the Senate Lecture Note Program for duplication and distribution.

Olmstead said that one of the first steps the Senate will take will be to deal with that problem.

Other objections heard from professors were that students are using the notes as a substitute for classes. Asked if he thought that charge had any validity Olmstead replied, "No, not true. A poll taken by SES (last semester) indicated that a large percentage of students using the service attended classes 90% of the time or better."

As a result of this the administration has been pressured by some professors to have the operation terminated. However, Olmstead said that negotiations were held last semester with the administration to alleviate the problem. Assistant Provost David Bishoff will be sending a letter to the faculty asking them to cooperate with the program. "Bishoff feels the program is worthwhile," Olmstead said.

The third reason for the Senate taking over the operation, Olmstead felt, was the fear that "If the Senate didn't take over the program now, the program would cease to operate, students would lose the notes, and 20 students would be out of work. The Senate would then find it very difficult to start over again as it would lack the experience needed to run the operation without those presently in the organization."

For the rest of this semester the program will be functioning more or less as it has been so far. They hope to make some changes concerning the accuracy of the notes. This would be done by employing students who have either taken the course or are majoring in the subject to take the notes. They also hope to be able to give the professors teaching the courses a copy of the notes for their comments.

Olmstead stressed that the new organization is open to any suggestions anyone might have to better the quality of the service. This he said, includes students, faculty and administration.

While they hope to expand the service next semester, there are no concrete plans drawn up at this time. However, several professors have proposed that they type the notes for their own lectures and give them to the Senate Lecture Note Program for duplication and distribution.

At this time the program covers 40 sections in 26 courses. There are slightly more than 20 people working for the program, all students or spouses of students. The notes are given either by shorthand or recorded on cassette recorders. The person taking the notes then transcribes them and gives them to the note service for duplication and distribution.

Jackson State College Trial Begun

BILOXI, Miss. (AP)-An all-white jury was seated Monday as trial began in a $13.4 million damage suit stemming from the May 14, 1970, shooting at Jackson State College in which two black youths were killed.

Nine men and three women were sworn in before U.S. District Court Judge Walter L. Nixon, Jr., along with two male alternate jurors.

The judge recessed the trial until Tuesday at the request of Ralph McAfee, an attorney for the plaintiffs, who said he needed time to prepare.

The trial is expected to last four to six weeks.

The case consolidated five suits seeking damages from 55 defendants, including former Gov. John Bell Williams.

It is the first time accusations based on the shooting have been before the court.

A lawyer for the plaintiffs, who asked that he not be named, said out of court that the effort to show that police over-reacted when called to the campus during a disturbance is more important than the actual damages sought.

Federal and state grand juries issued no indictments after the shooting. A Hinds County grand jury said the burst of gunfire was justified.

In The Nation And The World

Nixon Back From China

WASHINGTON (AP)-President Nixon returned home Monday night from an epic journey to China, proclaiming that his mission launched the long process of bridging the gap left by years of hostility and laid the foundation for a new structure of world peace.

Addressing a crowd of several thousand jammed into an airport hangar-and a national television audience-Nixon traced the details of the communique issued after his unprecedented talks with Chinese leaders.

He repeated a phrase he used several times in China-"Peace is too urgent to wait for centuries. We must seize the moment and move toward that goal now."

"That is what we have done on this journey," Nixon said.

He expressed hope that as a result of his trip "our children will have a better chance to grow up in a peaceful world."

Nixon noted the devotion of the Chinese to their way of government, but said: "I come back to America with an even stronger faith in our system of government."

He said-without giving specifics-that a procedure had been set up to continue discussions with Chinese leaders in the future.

The object, Nixon said, is to "talk about differences rather than fight about them."

"There were no secret deals of any kind" reached during his talks, Nixon said.

"We do not bring back any written or unwritten agreement that will guarantee peace in our time," he continued. There is no magic formula, Nixon said, but "we have made some necessary and important beginnings."

He invoked the "seize the moment" statement-similar to Chairman Mao Tse-tung's phrase "Seize the hour"-when he talked of an American redwood sapling planted in China by the U.S. party.

The growth of a redwood takes centuries, Nixon said, "so we hope that the seeds planted on this journey for peace will grow and prosper" into a more enduring peace.

As President and Mrs. Nixon stepped from the blue-and-white presidential jet, the "Spirit of '76," the Army herald trumpeters sounded ruffles and flourishes, followed by "Hail to the Chief," the national anthem and other martial music with five other service bands joining in.

Then, Vice President Spiro T. Agnew, at their side, they walked along the ranks of congressional leaders, Cabinet officers and diplomats to the platform where Nixon faced the television cameras and the crowd jammed into the large hangar.

Agnew, in welcoming Nixon, said "Because of your visit, the Chinese and American people stand further removed from the confrontation the world has feared for decades. We feel easier tonight because of your trip."

Israeli Guerrillas Halt Attack On Lebanon

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Israeli forces withdrew from southeastern Lebanon Monday after four days of attacks on Arab guerrilla havens near the border. Israel claimed about 50 guerrillas had been slain and nearly 100 wounded. Guerrillas acknowledged losses of 20 dead and 36 wounded.

Leaflets distributed to villagers in the fighting area warned of further Israeli assaults unless Lebanon clamps down on guerrilla activity.

The attacks were in retaliation for guerrilla raids last week that killed an Israeli couple and three soldiers.

The U.N. Security Council demanded that Israel halt the fighting and pull out of Lebanon. Israeli officials first declared they would not heed the resolution adopted early Monday, calling it "one-sided and cynical."

Military sources in Tel Aviv reported later that Israeli ground and air forces which pounded the area near Biblical Mt. Hermon had withdrawn, leaving the guerrillas "in complete disarray."

Lebanese witnesses said the withdrawal began about noon, when Israeli forces pulled out of the village of Hibbariyam, in the Arkoub region which had been controlled by guerrillas. The bulk of the troops crossed back into the Golan Heights section of occupied Syria by midafternoon and the withdrawal was completed by nightfall, they added.

A Israeli military spokesman said 11 Israel soldiers were wounded in the fighting.

Guerrilla communiques acknowledged losses of 20 dead and 36 wounded. Lebanese sources reported two civilians and 10 Palestinian refugees killed.

The Lebanese army began moving into the 100-square-mile area formerly occupied by the guerrillas after the Israelis pulled out.

"This time we intend to occupy the guerrilla position and keep them," said an army colonel.

Animal Restrictions Aired

BOSTON (AP)-State residents would be prohibited from keeping any pet which, in its natural environment, is "wild, dangerous or ferocious" under a bill aired Monday at a hearing before the legislature's joint Committee on Natural Resources.

Court to Decide

WASHINGTON (AP)-The Supreme Court agreed Monday to decide whether radio and television stations are required to broadcast paid advertisements on matters in public dispute.

Boyd Douglas Takes Stand

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP)-Star government witness Boyd Douglas took the witness stand Monday and said he prepared in advance his betrayal of the Rev. Philip Berrigan so authorities "would realize the threat of these people to the United States."

Douglas said he turned FBI informer against Berrigan partly because as a strict Catholic he was concerned about the actions of the militant antiwar priest and six codefendants on trial with him on federal conspiracy charges. All but one also are Catholics.

Amnesty Dangerous and Unfair

WASHINGTON (AP)-Selective Service Director Curtis W. Tarr told senators Monday that granting amnesty to Vietnam War draft resisters would be unfair and set a dangerous precedent.

Tarr told Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's judiciary subcommittee that the induction system could be wrecked by granting total amnesty now to those who chose exile rather than fight in Vietnam.

Italian Election Crisis

ROME (AP)-Italy, with its government defeated and parliament dissolved, has plunged into 70 days of political campaigning for new elections to end the country's worst political crisis since the war.

The elections, Sunday May 7, will test how much the strength of Italy's rival political parties has shifted in the past four years and indicate what if any new coalition could put together a majority government.

President Giovanni Leone dissolved parliament Monday, a month and a half after the breakup of the Roman Catholic-Socialist coalition which had ruled this Atlantic Alliance country for a decade.

S. Viets Launch New Drive

SAIGON (AP)-The South Vietnamese army launched another operation inside Cambodia and reported nine battles with the enemy in that country and in South Vietnam. Units of the U.S. 1st Air Cavalry Division reported two clashes with enemy soldiers Monday only 30 miles northeast of this capital.

The Saigon command said the fighting between its forces and Communist command troops has killed or wounded nearly 200 soldiers on both sides. The nine battles, the command said, took place Sunday from Eastern Cambodia to the South China Sea coast.

In the engagements, the command claimed 136 North Vietnamese and Viet Cong troops were killed while Saigon forces suffered 20 killed and 37 wounded. The South Vietnamese forces had air and artillery strike support.

The new drive into Cambodia, the command said, started Sunday with nearly 1,500 infantry, ranger, militia and armored troops in an attempt to halt infiltration of enemy soldiers into South Vietnam. The operation is taking place about 130 miles northeast of Saigon and three miles from the border.

A. Davis Jury Trial Selected

SAN JOSE, Calif. (AP)-The trial of black militant Angela Davis on murder, kidnap and conspiracy charges opened Monday with jury selection in a tightly secured courtroom here.

The 28-year-old Communist sat unsmilingly and silent, as the names of the first 12 prospective jurors were drawn from a wooden drum. They were five men and seven women. Four were under the age of 21-all students. All 12 were white.

Prosecutor Albert Harris, Jr. later reread a list of 104 prospective witnesses he plans to use to show what he describes as Miss Davis' role in a 1970 courtroom escape try at the Marin County Civic Center that left four men dead. The list includes John Thorne of San Jose, attorney for slain Soledad Brother George Jackson, and Jackson's mother, Georgia Jackson of Pasadena.

After Miss Davis entered the courtroom and gave a clenched fist salute to supporters, Superior Court Judge Richard E. Arnason delayed the trial start 45 minutes while he conferred privately with attorneys.

Early in court proceedings, prosecutor Harris put into the record his protest against a ruling by Arnason last week that prospective jurors not be questioned on the death penalty.

The prosecutor claimed that a California Supreme Court decision Feb. 18 ruling capital punishment unconstitutional is not final, so should not affect the trial.

Harris also asked that one of 13 overt acts detailing the alleged conspiracy be stricken from the indictment. It accuses Miss Davis and Jackson's 17-year-old brother Jonathan, slain in the escape try, of having "advocated the release from lawful custody" of the Soledad Brothers at a Los Angeles rally June 19, 1970.

Defense attorney Leo Branton objected, and Arnason denied the prosecution request without prejudice.

During the noon recess, Harris said he made the motion because "we're not going to prove it."

Miss Davis, wearing her hair in a large Afro style and long, gold-bangled earrings, used a handkerchief repeatedly. She had been reported suffering from a cold.

Among courtroom spectators were the defendant's mother, Sally Davis of Birmingham, Ala.; two brothers, Ben and Reginald, and Ben's wife, Sylvia. Ben is a defensive back for the Cleveland Browns pro football team.

Nationalists Suspect Secret Taiwan Agreement

TAIPEI (AP)-Chiang Kai-shek's government declared on Monday it will consider null and void any public or secret agreement President Nixon may have made with the Chinese Communists affecting the rights and interests of Nationalist China.

The statement indicated the Nationalists suspect there may have been some Taiwan agreement in Peking last week that was not mentioned in a joint U.S.-Chinese communique Sunday in Shanghai.

A government statement issued by the Foreign Ministry also said the Taiwan question can be settled only when the Nationalists take back the mainland.

At the same time, it called the President's agreement for people-to-people exchanges with the Communist Chinese "tantamount to inviting wolves into one's home."

However, the statement on the outcome of Nixon's eight-day visit to China seemed a reiteration of past Nationalist positions. It is doubtful the government will move much further on the subject until it hears later in the week from Marshall Green, the U.S. assistant secretary of state who accompanied Nixon to China and is now on a tour of some Asian nations to explain the outcome.

The Nationalists are particularly concerned that the United States may be leaving them open to takeover by the Communists on the mainland. One indication of this concern showed up Monday on the Taipei stock exchange where prices took a dip.

The government statement focused chiefly on a section in the joint communique saying the United States acknowledges there is but one China and that this is something for Chinese themselves to settle. It said U.S. military forces on Taiwan would begin leaving gradually as tensions in this area diminish.

The Nationalists themselves have always maintained there is but one China-the one headed here by President Chiang.

Kesey's Third Party

By ALLEN KOENIG

In one of those strange ways in which the earth moves, Ken Kesey (Prankster prime minister), Ken Babbs (second- in-command), Paul Sawyer (Unitarian minister and friend of the Pranksters) and Kansas Kathy appeared in Amherst last week. On a swing through this part of the country, Kesey spoke to a full house at the Amherst College cage on Thursday night, hoping to plant some seeds for a 3rd party. (Yes, you heard correctly--tricky dick goes to Peking, Bobby Seale comes out in favor of working within the system, and Ken Kesey, although denying the possibility, is a potential 3rd party presidential candidate.)

Although there's still a lot of the Electric Kool-Aid Acid Prankster in them, it is apparent from talking to Kesey et al that the people Tom Wolfe wrote nearly 400 pages about have changed. That movie is history. As Kesey said, "We'd look like Jimmy Durante if we were doing those things today." The Pranksters have moved on- towards a philosophy and life style aimed at lessening the economic ties this society lays on. This means a deep involvement with the land, the most basic means of production. Kesey and his people have done much in their own area in recent years towards this end, including work with the Whole Earth Catalogues and with other west coast people's projects.

This change in life style is perhaps the key issue in their politics. If people are to be self-supporting, this country has to be turned around from the decline in individual ownership of land. As Kesey pointed out, a strange thing has happened in America; the land no longer supports you; you must support your land. If one is to own land, one must by necessity become politically involved, because the cards are heavily stacked against such ownership. With subsidization and various tax breaks for the farming monopolies versus piddling returns and a poor tax situation for the small farmer, some 40,000 small farms go under each year. When these farms go on the block, they are picked up by Safeway, Bank of America, and other creeping corporations. Ownership is thus being concentrated in a few hands, and it is a process of positive feedback, with increased holdings resulting in political power directed towards enactment of legislation that aids and abets more of the same.

There are two ways to reverse this trend: revolution or political evolution. Revolution does not appear to be de rigeur this year, at least not in the sense that we all thought of it such a short time ago. This year, it's politics.

Could this amount to a campaign platform for a 3rd party? Kesey said that people are starting to speak to each other through the land; they don't intend to be politically bullshitted by anyone who hasn't paid some real dues. This paints a picture that could fit some of our romantic notions concerning the men who settled this country. Kesey and Babbs and many others, American cowboy-farmer-lumberjacks, thinking about recreating a frontier, but not just a frontier of land. These people deal as much with changing thought as they do with changing economics, and that's a crucial issue.

In attempting to convey impressions, it is important to point out that there is still a lot of Ken Kesey and the Merry Pranksters, early sixties folk heroes to the psychedelic movement, involved in this story. It's great fun to see these people, and remember what you read about the acid tests, the bus, the pranks...but things have changed. One is tempted to talk of idealogical maturation...but who knows? It has all the makings of a very strange and interesting 1972, I think. And let us not forget--Ken Kesey, in the middle of his northeast campaign swing--"...we'll know that something's up for sure if Nixon starts throwing the Ching."

Mao Comes To America

WASHINGTON--Every one of us who has been glued to the TV set since President Nixon and his party arrived in China now knows more about the People's Republic than he dared dreamed he would.

Thanks to our able TV correspondents, we are now aware of what a hat costs, what kind of leather people wear on the soles of their shoes, how people walk in a park and how many bricks it takes to build a brick teahouse.

One can't help projecting into the future, when Mao Tse-tung makes his first visit to the United States and his activities are beamed back via satellite to the people in China:

"Good evening, comrades--this is Wo-pang of the Anti-Imperialist Television Network Broadcasting System, bringing to you live and in red color the banquet that President Nixon is giving in honor of our beloved and venerated leader, Chairman Mao, and his beloved and venerated wife, Madame Mao.

"Ba Ba Rah, what do you make of all of this so far?"

"Wo, the thing that impressed me the most was the reception the American people gave our beloved Mao. I was told by my interpreter that no one had received such a reception in Washington since Mayor John Lindsay joined the Democratic Party. The people seem very pleased to see Chairman Mao."

"Did you see many schoolchildren waving to Chairman Mao?"

"No, I didn't, but the interpreter told me that was because most of the children go to school on buses and it's hard to see them waving. Wo, what impressed you the most so far about this trip?"

"I think the thing that impressed me the most is that the U.S. Marine Band had managed to learn the Chinese national anthem. I believe this is a very good sign for future Chinese-American relations. They're starting to eat now. Do you have any idea what they're eating, Ba Ba Rah?"

"I have the menu right here in front of me. the first dish is fruit cocktail, which is supposed to be an American delicacy."

"It is, Ba Ba Rah. I had some for breakfast and I can assure our Chinese viewers it is very delicious. Our beloved Mao is now eating his fruit salad with a spoon."

"Yes, Wo, Chairman and Madame Mao have been practicing for months with a spoon and fork and knife. They both seem to be handling them very well."

"Quite well, Ba Ba Rah. Chairman Mao looks very much at ease. Who is that he is speaking to next to him?"

"My interpreter says that is Billy Graham, a minister who is the second-most-important man in the Administration. The man speaking to Madame Mao is Bebe Rebozo, a friend of President Nixon's who is the third-most-important man in the Administration."

"Chairman Mao is now talking to a woman. Who is she?"

"That is Martha Mitchell, who is considered the most important woman in the Administration."

"Billy Graham seems to be handing pamphlets to Chairman Mao. What do you suppose they are?"

"I don't know, Wo, but my interpreter says he believes Mr. Graham may be trying to persuade Chairman Mao to become a Christian."

"Now Bebe Rebozo is handing pamphlets to Madame Mao. What do they say?"

"My interpreter says that Bebe Rebozo is probably trying to sell Madame Mao some Florida real estate."

"Who are those people who have just come out on the stage, Ba Ba. Rah?"

"They are the American entertainers. They are called the Ray Coniff Singers."

"One of the women is pulling a sign out of her bosom. Is that unusual?"

"Oh, no, Wo. My interpreter informs me it is always done when somebody entertains at the White House."

The Big Wheel Run By Faith

By MARK VOGLER

Around, and around, and around she goes, and where she stops nobody knows--OR CARES!!!

Apathy, in many respects, is like a wheel. The rim can be said to represent the important issues at stake. The spokes are emblematic of the unconcerned population. As the rim of the wheel increases in velocity, the spokes start to multiply--but the two never merge.

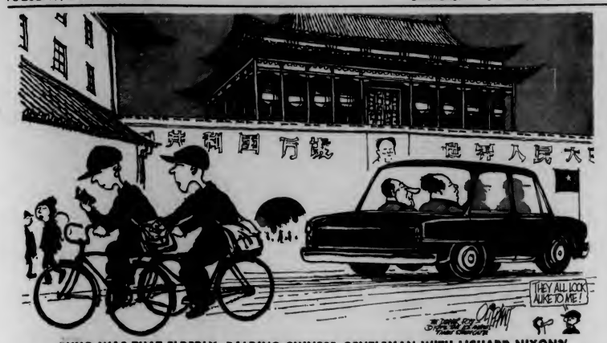
Interpreting this symbolism into terms of scientific logic (Newtonian Law of Apathy), the greater the number of issues at stake, the higher your level of apathy becomes.

Let's put this concept of apathy into use on the university level by taking the case of a recent student senate election that was held in a particular dorm. Apathy is the word which could be used for the percentage of the electorate that exercised their right to vote.

Less than a third of the residents (90 out of 308) cast ballots. The victor emerged with a sorry majority of 49. What made it even more sorry was the fact that 32 students on his corridor took part in the election. The runnerup secured 28 votes, and in fact his corridor was the second most active in the election. Apathy, my friends, apathy.

When asked why some didn't vote, the common response was that: "I didn't know the candidates who were running." Well sure as hell make it a point to know them.

It's evident that the electorate can't entirely be blamed. After all, the candidates who campaign for office, don't give it their all to make themselves known. There secret formula for winning is by painting the dorm up with handbills. The more you display, the more you'll collect at the polls. But what is more relevant at this point is that a great many students could give a hoot what the issues are and who are the policy makers--in this case, the student senators.



Then you hear that cock and bull story that the senators aren't worth a plug nickel. They stand for what they are, a bunch of grungy hippie lobbyists who crave some kind of prestige. Why vote? Why even have a student senate? It's not going to accomplish anything. It's just plain tokenism used to pacify the students in order to make them believe they have some power. There's no way you're going to fight this establishment.

Well, I guess if that's the type of defeatest attitude one wants to possess, then that's his hang-up. And as long as he wants to conform to the traditional mode of the system, then he's going to be entrapped among those spokes for a long time.

Granted there is stringent control exerted on us by the so-called big wheels who make everything go on this university. However, the student body can throw a roadblock and get things rolling in the right direction. But it's up to the students to mobilize into a strong entity, to know what's going on, to get more involved, to advocate change for the better, and to make it happen.

Start with what you've got and build upon it (senate), don't tear it down. Tokenism is just a frustrated myth. Apathy breeds apathy. Whitmore may be like the Rock of Gibraltar. But if a unified and fortified legion of students keep pecking away at it, it will start to crumble our way. If you have some legitimate grievance pertaining to something on this campus, then investigate and act.

Get out of this rat race. Don't be a guinea pig. Make the wheel move forward instead of being content to have it remain stationary. Strip the spokes and mount the rim--it's better than going around in circles.

People Die In Schools

To the Editor:

"The only difference between schools and old-age homes is that more people die in schools."

Bob Dylan

Dylan's words only began to express the feelings of helplessness and anger I felt as I walked out of Thursday's School of Education School Council meeting. The major issue discussed there was whether or not to institute The Completely Modular Curriculum (CMC). Although the published proposal claims to be a "report to the community," how many of the School's 3,000 undergraduates are even aware that such a program is in the making?

What angered me most is that parts of the proposal and, most importantly, the strategy of instituting the proposal has been characterized by disregard for the undergraduate's interest. In answer to this, proponents of the program only succeed in being hypocritical.

First they say that they held open meetings in order to summon undergraduate input. But these meetings were publicized only at the School of Education—the Collegian did not carry any notices. Unlike the faculty and graduates who spend most of their day at the School, undergraduate majors spend most of their days and have most of their classes out on the campus proper. While they were claiming to initiate undergraduate involvement, at the same meeting the same people also said that undergraduates were not notified in the extensive planning days of the CMC because it would be "too confusing for them." The CMC staff now plans to get the proposal through the School Council and then do a rush job of notifying undergraduates through summer mailings, pre-registration notices, etc.

Now that a few undergraduates on the Council and on the Academic Matters Committee have had the opportunity to examine, criticize, and discuss the Report, we find ourselves with less than a week left to scramble around and amend it. That is, if amendment is possible at this stage. I felt pressured by a sort of ultimatum at the Council meeting: "If it's not passed now, it never will be...Funding is important...Time is important.... Competency, evaluation, and advising will grow with the program once it is instituted...Pass it, we can amend it later."

One of the major criticisms of the proposal is in its advising component. Graduates would hold the bulk of this enormous task. Besides defining and setting up a course or workshop, just where does the responsibility of the faculty member lie in the new program? I am sure that the problem of trying to arouse faculty interest in advising undergraduates is not solely limited to the School of Education. It is a problem felt throughout the University, and too, certainly not all faculty members, lack initiative in advising. But in the School of Education especially, it is sad and ironic to see far too many educators locked up in their own ivory towers writing books, papers, chairing innumerable committees and working on various grants and projects with graduates.

In the School of Education these grants, books, and papers are done on educational research to better our educational systems, yet outside the door, across the campus, undergraduates do not have the opportunity to meet those who theorize and define. We did not have the proper chance to give meaningful input to the CMC. Although "The CMC promises a much more meaningful educational experience for the student," and although "Modularization means a wider selection of courses and an opportunity for highly-motivated students to design a personal program of study which will stimulate their intellectual and human growth," I personally cannot believe this. I see the proposal as it now stands (Feb. 24th) as a doctoral or graduate research project rather than a "Stimulation of intellectual and human growth" for the undergraduate student. How can one be expected to grow through new educational experiences if he has not been part of the shaping of those educational experiences in the first place?

Faculty, we are your students--if you let us die through neglect and disrespect, just remember we are the ones who in a few years will be teaching your children in the same death-inducing manner. If you feed us hypocrises, we will cough, we will spit, but being highly outnumbered in such representative areas as the School Council, we will be forced to swallow what educators decide are "meaningful educational experiences." So we will digest them and they will become part of us...and they will poison us.

The major point stressed in the Council meeting was that the decision us to whether the CMC will be implemented next fall must be made now. Due to the limited outside funding and the impetus that may be lost in a year of delay, we may never have the resources to put it into effect again. They proposal as basically good potential; however, it neglects the problems already existing in the School of Education. Unless students can participate in building curriculum for themselves, and unless the faculty can develop a larger interest and involvement in student advising the proposal should not be implemented.

Barbara Ann Boulden

Attaboy Ralph

To the Editor:

The growing student commitment at the University of Massachusetts and other colleges in the area to the formation of a Western Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (WMPIRG) should be encouraging to all citizens interested in developing knowledgeable citizenship. The hardworking and idealistic students leading this effort know that building the institutions of citizen research and action is the basic pioneering need in this country. Other statewide groups in Oregon and Minnesota have already voted to contribute a few dollars per student per year to retain their full time lawyers, scientists, and other skilled professionals to advance the forces of genuine progress and justice in helping to solve serious problems besetting many Americans and the nation.

Many students today want to correct injustices and apply the resources and intelligence in the nation to the enormous problems that prevail now and which will loom even larger in the future. Everyone knows about these problems such as poverty, unemployment, discrimination, pollution, consumer injustice, threat of war, concentration of power in fewer corporations and larger governments and the growing futility of the dollar to respond to people's needs.

Students can do something about these problems while they are students. They can research them, develop strategies for change and participate in their implementation. This is the most intensive educational experience for it challenges the intellect and the value system of the student in tandem and motivates effort and dedication. One of the main purposes of education is to develop the capacity and will to be effective citizens, whatever their respective value systems may be. A diversity of viewpoints indeed renews and invigorates responsible citizenship. What is needed is a student directed institution which will act as a catalyst for opportunities which students can take hold of and direct toward problem solving. Before most forums of decision-making--corporate, or union--special interests are well represented but the public or broad interest is not. The establishment of WMPIRG would provide students with an effective professional voice before these forums and enlist enormous student participation, by way of research, laboratory testing, and other skills both during the school year and during summer vacations. Citizenship experience should be an integral part of educational attainments. It is hoped that more students will support the WMPIRG proposal and help create a constructive and dynamic force for good in the state.

Senseless Training

To the Editor:

If Professor Simon of the School of Education is genuinely unaware of the difference between requiring people to undergo sensitivity training and, say, to take introductory zoology or a foreign language, it may be useful to draw his attention to some of the differences. (See his letter in the February 16 issue of the MDC.)

1. The worst thing that can happen to a student who is required to take a course he is not interested in (or in badly taught) is that he will be bored or waste time or get a bad grade which lowers his/her average. To be sure, all such outcomes are undesirable but a great pressure and the incompetent tinkering with the personalities and personal values of people which occur when people are pressured into sensitivity training guided by incompetents. "Unfavorable reactions" to sensitivity training, often associated with dubious schemes of personality improvement or change, imposed upon an unwilling individual can be far more devastating than courses which are designed to impart some clearly defined area of knowledge or information however ineptly taught.

2. Most courses taught at the University are taught by competent people insofar as competence can be assessed or ascertained by processes of professional certification (such as exemplified by the Ph.D. degree), professional peer judgment and more recently student evaluation. It is easier to assess a person's competence in teaching a course oriented toward the acquisition of some specific form of knowledge or skill than to evaluate skills required for sensitivity training. In most units of the University people are given teaching responsibilities on the basis of some ascertainable skill or competence, not on the basis of their own beliefs about their own competence or profession of good intentions. (If Professor Simon would counter this point by suggesting that conventional processes of certification do not guarantee competence, one can simply point out that while this is true, they are a lot more reliable than by-passing such standardized procedures or substituting intuition for the assessment of competence. However, in view of the efforts of the Ed School to have its own Ph.D. degree program, evidently the belief in the value of conventional certification is not totally rejected.)

3. His question as to why can't all courses be voluntary is in part answered in my first point which at least suggests reasons why it is more important to make sensitivity training voluntary. But, obviously, there is more to this question and it may still be asked why should not everything be made voluntary. This is an issue which underlies the differences between the Ed School philosophy and members of the faculty who can find reasons for requirements. The rationale for requirements rests on the assumption that the acquisition of knowledge, competence or specific skills (as opposed to the deepening of sensitivity, self expression, character improvement, joy in life, etc.) is not a totally haphazard or spontaneous or completely individualized process but one which requires a measure of discipline, organization and guidance and that those who are more knowledgeable in a given field of learning (i.e. the faculty) are in a better position to establish procedures for the acquisition of knowledge in that field (or see more clearly what is required for competence in that field) than those who are less knowledgeable, i.e. students. This modest proposition, I fear, may strike Professor Simon as arrogant academic elitism or authoritarianism in view of our seemingly different premises about the relationship between education, knowledge, competence, character improvement, religion, psychotherapy and other matters.

We are also likely to disagree about grading but let me try to answer his question as to why grading should be required. It should be required for several reasons and if I substitute the word "evaluation" for grading (since grading is a form, a standardized form of evaluation) the issue becomes clearer. Even Professor Simon might agree that some form of evaluation of students by faculty may be useful, especially for the students themselves. Evaluation is also legitimate because graduate schools and future employers wish and have a right to ascertain the competence of applicants. Grading (or some form of evaluation) is also necessary as a device for screening out those who are not qualified (or motivated) to attend institutions of higher learning and whose place might well be taken by others who are--this is a simple matter of distributive justice as long as not everybody, regardless of ability or motivation, can be admitted to institutions of higher learing. Finally, it is also possible, although this is more debatable, that students, or a high proportion of the, are more highly motivated when their performance is evaluated than when it is not. I certainly have never seen a highly motivated student lose his motivation because he was graded while I have seen many students who were motivated by grading--impure as such motivation might be. In any event, it seems that the Ed School itself believes in motivating some people by evaluation, hence, the rigorous, mandatory evaluation of their faculty by students. In this practice one may discern a curious double standard or two conceptions of human nature, one of which is applied to teachers whose performance can evidently be expected to improve by rigorous and standardized evaluation by students, and the other which is applied to students who motivation is believed to wither once their performance is similarly evaluated by teachers!

'Focus' On N.H. Primary

Tonight at 10 P.M. on WMUA's "Focus" program, commentator Ken Mosakowski will take a close look at the Presidential Primary race shaping up in New Hampshire for the Granite State's first-in-the-nation primary election next Tuesday.

Entered in the Democratic primary are Edward Coll, an anti-poverty worker from Connecticut; Senator Vance Hartke of Indiana; Senator George McGovern of South Dakota; Senator Edmund Muskie of Maine; Congressman Wilbur Mills of Arkansas; and Mayor Sam Yorty of Los Angeles, California. Entered in the Republican primary are Congressman John Ashbrook of Ohio; Congressman Paul McCloskey of California; and President Nixon.

A number of students from the Amherst area are expected to campaign in New Hampshire this weekend on behalf of McGovern, McCloskey, and Ashbrook.

Draft Counselor's Corner

Counseling Course Offered

By GILBERT J. SALK

One quick news flash: A lot of folks have been requesting a draft counselor's training course. Now, due to the courtesy of Southwest, the course will be offered--with credit! The class will meet for four consecutive Tuesday evenings, starting next Tuesday, March 7. Each class will meet from 7-10. The colloquium will be offered on a pass-fail basis for one credit. There will be a five-dollar charge for materials (books), but the fee will be negotiable for those whose finances are shaky. The course will be open to both male and female members of the University community, and will be taught by Gil Salk, the coordinator of Draft Counseling Services. Those interested in registering for the course should call Wally Silva in the SW Area Office at 545-2803.

The new draft regulations create a new deferment which may provide a simple alternative to the draft for many of you. The 4-G is a "surviving son" classification which goes well beyond the limits of the old 4-A "sole surviving son" statute.

Under the old regulations, you qualified for a deferment if either your father, brother, or sister died in or as a result of military service, and if you were the only living son in your family. If you met these two qualifications, you were automatically eligible for a 4-A deferment.

Now, if you meet the above criteria, you automatically receive a 4-G, but there are additional ways of getting the 4-G. If a father, brother, or sister, since December 31, 1959, died in or as a result of military service, you qualify for the 4-G, even if you have a living brother.

In addition, you may also qualify for a 4-G if a relative is either a prisoner of war or missing in action. In all cases, the 4-G deferment must be given you if you notify and can substantiate to your board any of the above information. The exemption can be taken away only in time of declared war or national emergency.

You should note that the law does not specify that your relative must have been shot in a battle. The death does not have to be the result of hostile action. If, for example, your father contracted malaria while serving in the Phillipines in the 50s, and died as a result of the malaria anytime after Jan. 1, 1960, then you would qualify for a 4-G. This would be true even if you happen to have 8 living brothers. On the other hand, if he died before 1960 and you have living brothers, you would not be eligible for deferment. If he died before 1960 and you have no living brothers, you would be able to claim a 4-G.

As with all other possible deferments, it is a good idea to consult a draft counselor if you think you might qualify for a 4-G deferment. The counselor will help you to compile any needed documentation to send to your local board, and inform you of other possible deferments for which you might qualify.

PEACE

Free draft counseling is available from Draft Counseling Services in 923 Campus Center.

Lecture On American Military

Dr. Samuel P. Huntington, Professor of Government at Harvard University, will give a lecture and discussion on the topic "The American Military: Present Crises and Future Challenges" on Thursday, March 2, at 8:15 P.M. in Mahar Auditorium. Dr. Huntington has been at Harvard since 1951 and has done extensive research and writing on political and military relationships. He has chaired the Council on Vietnamese Studies, Southeast Advisory Group from 1967 through 1969. He has authored The Soldier and the State and The Common Defense and has edited Changing Patterns of Military Politics. Dr. Huntington's lecture is sponsored by the Department of Air Science and is open to all students and faculty in the Five College area.

Alternative Lifestyle Speaker Tonight

Mildred Loomis, editor of the Green Revolution, will speak on communes, back-to-the-land, and alternative lifestyles tonight at 7:30 p.m. in 162 CC.

Ms. Loomis has been involved in the back-to-the-land movement for over 30 years. She was education director for the School for Living in Brookville, Ohio, and was the construction foreman on a two-story building at the School.

She had led conferences on alternative life styles, and is the author of Go Ahead and Live and Clarifying Economics of Peace. In addition, she has studied with and assisted Ralph Borsodi, who started writing about decentralization in the late twenties and early thirties, and whose books are now being published.

Ms. Loomis offers both the insight of one currently involved in experimenting with new lifestyles and the perspective of one who has been both living and studying alternatives for more than 30 years.

A discussion period will follow Ms. Loomis' address, which is open to the public without charge.

Ms. Loomis' appearance on campus is sponsored jointly by CULTURNATIVES and the United Christian Foundation.

Career News

Coming Attractions

By PHILIP SCHIRMER

Following is a list of some of the activities planned by the Career Planning and Placement Office for the remaining weeks before spring recess. (This list is admittedly vague and incomplete-more detailed information may be obtained from the placement office and from the "Career News" bulletin.)

Interviewers from the Pittsfield and Winchester Mass. Public School systems will be conducting group meetings during the weeks of March 6 and 16 respectively. Sign up in the placement office if interested.

On March 10, a representative from the School of Business of the State University of New York at Albany, and , on March 13 a representative from the Boston College School of Business will be on hand to discuss their various programs.

The Thunderbirds Graduate School of International Management, (in Phoenix Arizona), will be here March 2 to talk to anyone interested in a career on an international level.

If law is your bag, check out the possibility of becoming a Lawyer's Assistant by signing up for an interview with a representative from the Institute for Paralegal training who will be on campus March 16. (Candidates should have the potential for graduate work, be prepared for the tuition involved, and be able to go to Philadelphia for the course.)

The extended list of future activities includes representatives from the school systems of seven states, a bank, an insurance company, an accounting firm, a department store, two government agencies and a hospital, (to name just a few.)

by SYDNEY OMARR

Author Lawrence Durrell, born under Pisces, is now embarked on a new hobby: the study of astrology. Durrell, whose works are read the world over, became interested in astrology after meeting me. "You are," he said, "either a great mind reader or there is a great deal to astrology." Durrell intends to find the answer.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You will be able to analyze, make correct determinations. Welcome changes. Give full play to creative thinking. Member of opposite sex is impressed and lets you know it. Good news where work, health, enter picture.

"Bart's" Talents Hampered By Lack Of Home Ice

By BILL BALLOU

One of the main reasons for the success of the UMass varsity hockey team this season has been the fine play of their defensive corps consisting of Brian Sullivan, Al Nickerson, Don Lowe, Bob Bartholomew, and Bob Shilalie.

Bartholomew in particular has had a good season, and is the leading point-getter among the Redmen blueliners. UMass is lucky to have a player of Bartholomew's ability, but it's rather unfortunate that a talented player like him isn't given the opportunity to sharpen his skills to an even finer edge.

The main reason for this is the simple fact that UMass does not have a rink for its hockey team to practice in and play its home games in. As a player, Bartholomew has his own feelings about the desirability of a rink, but is also able to look at it from a student's point of view.

"The main thing about it," he said, "that I want to get across is that you shouldn't go around calling it a hockey rink, but rather an ice or even better just an athletic facility. People don't want to spend money on just a building for hockey, but a rink can be used for so many things that it's really versatile. They've got a beautiful rink up in Vermont and use it for concerts in the warm weather; the same could be true of this facility.

"A lot of rinks can also be used as indoor tennis courts and the locker room facilities can be expanded to include a lot of different sports."

The senior defenseman also figures that the possible new building could also have a salutary effect on the individual player. He pointed out how the lack of a rink and being forced to practice at Amherst's Orr Rink doesn't give a hockey player the proper chance to develop his weak points.

"Where it's really hurt me is in that extra half hour after practice that we don't get," he explained. "Whereas most teams have a two-hour practice session and time after practice to go out on your own to work on your shot or skating or anything you want, we just get an hour and a half and then right off the ice. That way I'm not able to use that extra time and work on anything that I want and figure I should practice."

In spite of the rather difficult practice situation "Bart" and his teammates are put into, he says that over the four years he's been here there has been great improvement shown by a lot of people on the team.

"Everybody works hard and Canniff (head coach Jack Canniff) has done a fantastic job in developing players. I played against some of the guys in high school and prep school and the improvement is really noticeable."

In spite of the great improvement in the current crop of Redmen, without a rink and better practice facilities, you can't really expect an equal amount of improvement from the present crop of JV's.

"The JV's get what practice time they can, usually that's left over after our needs. And they're the guys who really need the time so they can improve. In my freshman year, we were lucky and got a whole lot of ice time and it really helped. But these guys coming up don't have that advantage."

UMass is very lucky to have a Bob Bartholomew on its defense, as his mates and P.J. Flaherty will attest to. When Bob was being recruited, his choice came down to between Boston University and UMass and he made his decision while on a tour of Europe. But when he made that decision to attend UMass, he was under the impression that a rink was coming soon. At least, that's what the then Dean of Physical Education, Warren McGuirk, told him.

Bartholomew has no regrets he attended UMass, although he says that "I'd be a better hockey player if I had played with a Division I school, simply because the competition would have been better."

But it's too late to give Bob Bartholomew that rink he deserved, and it's too late to make up for all those half hours after practice he would have liked.

But it isn't too late to look toward the future.

Skiers Win Osborne Division Trophy

The UMass ski team completed its series of eight Osborne Division ski races at Mount Whittier in Ossipie, New Hampshire, by winning the AIC slalom in a blinding snowstorm on Saturday and finishing second in the Boston University Giant Slalom under clear skies and on beautiful snow on Sunday.

In the eight races against the same seven colleges the ski team finished first five times and second three times for an overall division record of 53 wins to 3 losses. In division standings Northeastern was second, BC third, BU fourth, Amherst fifth, Tufts sixth, AIC seventh, and Bentley eighth.

In the eleven years that it has been in the New England Intercollege Ski Conference, UMass has won the Osborne Trophy four times. The four top teams from each of the three divisions will meet for league honors on March 10 and 12 at Cranmore in North Conway, N.H. UMass is the defending NEISC champion team and hopes to successfully defend its championship in both slalom and giant slalom events.

In the AIC slalom the Redmen "won big" using the two run times of Tuck Woodruff who finished 5th overall, Jerry Curran who was 11th, Kurt Syer who was 13th and Dick McWade finishing 15th among the 80 racers on the hill. The UMass "best four" team times was 321.8 seconds, Northeastern was a poor second with 332.1, Amherst had 334.0, BU 341.9, Tufts 342.9, B.C. 389.2, Bentley 511.5, and AIC 624.1. It was a soggy wet race in a heavy snowstorm but the Redmen managed to find their way successfully through the gates.

After the slalom Saturday the racers packed out the new snow on some steep terrain which Snow Cats could not negotiate to make a longer, faster race on Sunday. Sunday was a bright, cloudless, beautiful day with the best snow of the winter. It was less than a perfect day for UMass inasmuch as four of the six man UMass team had trouble.

Tuck Woodruff put two good ones together and finished 6th overall. Dick McWade, the dependable freshman, had two good runs and finished 10th, Dave Ferris who had an excellent first run skied off the course in his second but finished 13th anyway. A small child on skiis got past the course police and was in the track when Jerry Curran ran. He narrowly avoided the child, but had to stop and was given a re-run. The experience broke his concentration and his next two runs were only fair.

Both Kurt Syer and Dave Rutter fell. Northeastern's "best four" was 398.7 seconds while the Redmen had 400.9. UMass was only 2.2 seconds out in spite of a lot of trouble.

Next week-end will consist of two hard practices at Haystack Mountain as the team prepares for the NEISC Championship.

Ms. Lettis 9th In Nationals

By TJD

Charlotte Lettis, sophomore theater major, ran 5:01.5, her best, for 9th place in the mile women's mile in the National Indoor track meet held in She found that them "Big Kids" kick and elbow.

Charlotte drew lane three, a good starting position, much to the dismay of Debbie Heald an experienced miler who had to start behind Charlotte. When the gun went off, Ms. Heald charged ahead with elbows flying causing Charlotte and two other runners to fall on the first turn. Since they fell on the first turn, the race was called back and restarted. Charlotte received a spike wound in the shin and started for the second time bleeding slightly.

"I started very cautiously, confidence lay scattered all about the track near the first turn." Charlotte's time at the half-way point was 2:25 within a few seconds of the leader Ms. Doris Brown of Seattle, Washington, who won with a time of 4:44. Ms. Brown holds the women's indoor world record for the mile run, 4:40.

Charlotte was the least experienced runner to make the finals in the mile. All the other runners had been competing for 2 years, the 21-year-old Ms. Lettis has only been running for 8 months.

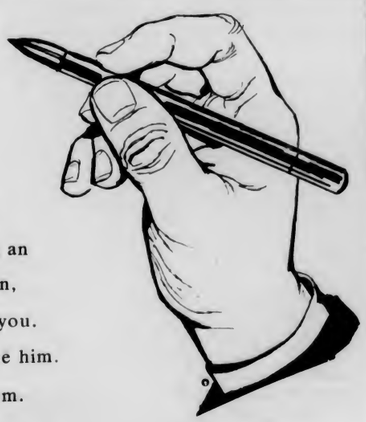
Charlotte plans to compete in long New England road races, ten miles and longer, during the month of March, and possibly a marathon.

Freshman sprinter Kathy Lawson ran a fast time in the first trial for the 220 dash, 24.7, then failed to qualify in the semi-finals, and was eliminated from the competition.

Hoopwomen Finally Triumph

"When yer hot, yer hot!" was the cry from the UMass bench last Thursday at Smith College where the girls earned their first victory of the season, 52-16.

This game featured many firsts for UMass; the first time the offense has broken the elusive 50-point barrier in scoring, the first time their offensive unit really clicked, and most important, the first time the girls had won all season.



UMass maintained a fast pace throughout the game, clearly in control all the way. They worked defensively with a press and concentrated on making their offensive plays count for scores.

By the half, the lead belonged to UMass, 20-6, and technically, the game was already won. But instead of slacking off, the third period five-some of Pat Glispen, Marilyn Ritz, Vicki Pagel, Sue Chapman and Beth Fayput on the finest display of UMass basketball this season, pouring in 19 points and piling up an incredible 70% shooting percentage for the period.

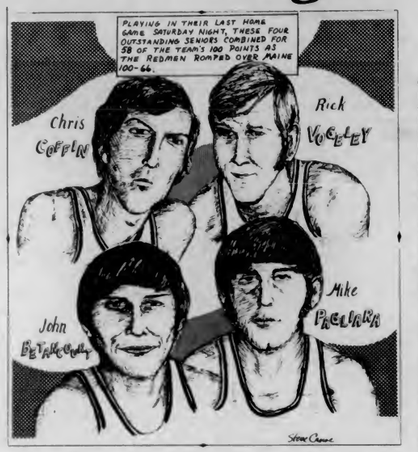
UMass, URI In Title Showdown Tonight

MDC Sports

By FRANK ANTOSIEWICZ



Today is the day of reckoning for the UMass basketball team, as far as the Yankee Conference is concerned, because a UMass win will clinch at least a tie, but a loss will put Rhode Island in the driver's seat with a 1/2 game lead and two home games left (Maine and UNH).

It all boils down to, as Coach Jack Leaman so aptly puts it, "the whole season rolled into one game." The cagers travel to Kingston, R.I., for a rematch knowing that this game will not be as easy as the slaughter of the Rams, 109-64, in the Cage ten days ago.

The Rams to date have had an up and down season with an upset over Providence, and losses to Maine and Boston University. Recently, R.I. was beaten by over 40 points by both the Redmen and Temple University, but have rebounded to even its record at 11-11 with a win over UConn. The big men for Rhody are 6'8 Don Blackman, 6'6 Robert Young and 6'4 Steve Rowell, along with 6'4 sharpshooter Phil Hickson.

The picture as to who will start for the cagers is still muddled with Tom McLaughlin, Al Skinner and Rich Vogeley with the inside track up front, and Captain Mike Pagliara, and either John Betancourt or Peter Trow in the backcourt. Charlie Peters may also re-enter the picture, as what was thought to be a shoulder separation, turns out to be a bad bruise.

Coach Leaman plans to continue pressing, which made things so difficult for the Rams at the Cage, knowing that his team will have to use their quickness to combat the bigger Rams. They key to UMass success will have to be the neutralization of Blackman, Rowell and Young by the team rebounding and quickness of the Redmen. Only time will tell, but tonight's showdown will go a long way towards the determination of the Yankee Conference Champion.

The UMass freshmen will also take on the Rhody frosh in quest of their fifteenth consecutive victory prior to the varsity game. Ten days ago at the Cage, the yearlings won convincingly, a 98-80 decision over the little Rams. Game time is 6 p.m.

The keys to the URI attack are 6'10 Bill Bird and 6'6 Jerry Minetti who combined for 55 points and 19 rebounds in their last outing against the Redmen.

Coach Fan Gaudette expects to start the same quintet of Bill Endicott, Jim Burke, Mike Flanagan, Tom Gillams and John Murphy, that has demolished the opposition so far this season by outscoring their opponents by an average of 20 points per game. The UMass frosh have just two more road games, URI tonight, and Brown Saturday, standing in their path to an undefeated season.

Grappling Trio Take N.E. Titles

By JOHN BOCK

New Britain, Conn.--The casual observer might have noticed that red was the predominant uniform color in the finals of the NEIWA tournament held in Kaiser Gym on the Central Connecticut State College campus. But that is where the similarity ends as five of the uniforms were worn by UMass grapplers while the other six were worn by the Springfield Chiefs.

Nine Redmen had advanced to the semi-finals while only seven Chiefs made it. The balance shifted thereafter and the fans clustering around the charts noted that UMass would be represented by Dave Amato at 118 pounds, Russ Chateauneuf at 134, Shelley Goldberg at 150, Bruce Buckbee at 190, and Carl Dambman at Heavyweight.

Three Champions came from these five in the forms of Chateauneuf, Buckbee, and Dambman. The story of their success begins a few weeks back.

At that time, Bruce was wrestling 177, Carl was wrestling heavy but making a stab at 190 and Russ was trying to get down to 134. Bruce had made the decision to go 190 because his chances were better. Carl decided to stay at heavy because he thought that the weight loss would rob him of strength. And Russ wasn't sure he could make it with his school load and the short period of time to do it.

Coach Doug Parker of SC mentioned that he had seen the best wrestling in seventeen years at this year's tournament. It is quite possible that he was right because none of the Springfield was here at 150 pounds that the upset of the tournament was seen. Springfield's Stan Southerdon bested Shelly 7-1 in the final match and ended the college career of UMass' greatest wrestler.

"I can't believe it. I choked, I guess. The pressure on me was too much and then Stan wrestled a great match. Win or lose, life goes on and I'll still keep wrestling."

The pressure Shelly was referring to was the fact that a recent NCAA ruling declared that to qualify for the NCAA's, you had to be the Champ. This, plus the fact that Shelly was the tournament favorite to repeat for the third time. The NCAA will see the error of their ruling when Goldberg does not show up at Maryland this year, as he was expected to put on quite a performance.

At 190 pounds it was Bruce Buckbee, senior from East Greenbush, New York, going against Conterato of Dartmouth, the boy who had upset Amherst's Gary Sklaver. Hawaii Five-O (Bruce's nickname) certainly made Conterato wish he could have been on the sands at Waikiki as Bruce power switched him twice and then rode the daylights out of him for the 5-3 decision and the Championship. "It made me about as happy as I can be because after last year's layoff, I didn't think I had a chance, especially with Sklaver in the same class." The team was happy for Bruce to and then so was Bruce's financee in Hawaii to make it complete.

Carl Dambman was the top seeded choice at Heavyweight. In the afternoon match, his finals opponent pinned Walsh of Brown, the man who beat Carl in the NCAA qualifiers last year. Bob Hill of SC was to be Carl's toughest match of the tourney, but instead wound up helping Carl win the Most Pins trophy, as the Drexel Hill, Pa., junior decked him in 4:46. Carl and Coach Barr sat in conference for quite awhile going over things to be wary of. Top of the list was Hill's bear hug which he had used to devastate three opponents. Carl stayed away from that and took the top position in the second period and then applied the pressure.

"I think I wanted to show Hill that I could really beat him instead of just beating him like I did in the dual match."

This was the last year for the NEIWA Championships as next year there will be a University and College Division Tourney that will qualify men for the NCAA's.

wrestlers had easy finals matches.

The 118 pound match saw Bob Meyer of SC tilt against Dave Amato for the Redmen, fulfilling the pre-tourney hopes. Meyer scored the first takedown, but Amato escaped and continued to be the aggressor. In fact, once Meyer got ahead he stalled for dear life as Dave continued to press him. Dave scored a takedown right in front of Coach Barr and the referee blithely called it out of bounds. Dave was awarded one point for stalling on Meyer's part but that wasn't enough and he lost 4-2. Said the plucky grappler from Rhode Island, "I'll be back next year, just wait."

The next UMass wrestler to step out on the mat was freshman Russ Chateauneuf. The announcer took about thirty seconds announcing Russ' opponent's titles and just made mention of the fact that Russ was from Lowell, Mass., and was a state champ. His foe was two-time New York State Runnerup Joe Savino from URI. Eight minutes later, Russ became the first freshman in the history of the NEIWA to win the varsity title. It was Chateauneuf all the way as he used his famous Granby roll to pick up four points and then a near leg cradle, that had picked him up two pins in the earlier bouts, for five more. When it was all over, Russ was victor 15-7 and Savino was on the bench in shock.

Pucksters Seeded Second; Hosts St. A's In Opener

By BILL BALLOU

The ECAC released the seedings for the Division II playoffs yesterday and to everyone's surprise, there are no surprises save the low position given to Buffalo.

The seedings contained good news for the UMass hockey team, giving them a tentative second seed. Vermont was given the first seed on the condition that they beat Norwich Wednesday night. The game is being played on Vermont's rink, so the chances of a Norwich victory are next to nil.

So, given that Vermont is going to be the top seed, and given that UMass will be second seed, the playoff situation looks like this:

1. Vermont	(11-2-1	.821)
2. UMass	(15-3-0	.833)
3. Merrimack	(11-4-0	.733)
4. Boston St.	(14-8-0	.636)
5. Buffalo	(10-2-0	.733)
6. Salem St.	(8-10-1	.422)
7. St. Anselm	(7-6-0	.538)
8. New England	(7-4-0	.636)

The system that will be used to play the games is a 1-8, 2-7, 3-6, 4-5, setup, and this means that the opponent for UMass in their first playoffs game on Saturday is going to be St. Anselm's.

Although the Saints don't have an impressive record, one of their seven wins is a 5-4 decision over the Redmen. This win, although attained under atrocious conditions was a well-deserved decision and St. Anselm's gave every indication it will be a tough customer. One factor in UMass' favor is that the game will be played on home ice, although exact details haven't yet been worked out.

The main significance of a top seeding position, beside the fact that the Redmen get to play a supposedly inferior team is in game location. The team with the higher seed gets the home ice advantage, and since the only team with a higher seed than UMass is Vermont, then the Redmen are assured of first game home ice advantage and if they get past that, then second game home ice advantage.

If UMass manages to get to the finals, then it can go either way. If their opponent is Vermont, then they must travel to Burlington and play in Vermont's rink. Anyone beside Vermont and the final is at home.

The playoff dates are Saturday, March 4, for the first round; Wednesday, March 8, for the semi-finals; and Saturday, March 11, for the finals. No one knows who'll paly who in the second and third rounds, but the opening round stacks up like this:

1. Vermont vs. New England at Burlington, Vt.
2. UMass vs. St. Anselm's at Amherst
3. Merrimack vs. Salem St. at Billerica
4. Boston St. vs. Buffalo at Boston

When Do We Begin To Help Our Children

By ROBERT J. CALLAHAN, JR.

In the past few weeks, much coverage has been given to the fund raising attempts of both the Concert Committee and S.O.S. (Students Offering Support) by the Collegian and the other media in this area.

The Concert Committee has been given $8,112 from Student Senate funds and is now trying to acquire up to $4,000 more in funds from the Area Governments on campus. Meanwhile the funds collected by S.O.S. are quite meager-a two day drive in the Campus Center only netted $95, a mere drop in the bucket.

As can be seen from the figures quoted above, the financial situation of these two organizations differs greatly.

The money spent on this free concert purportedly to be held some time this April, will be for a five hour long event. When it is over, the money will be gone, the fun will be over, and the students on this campus, this hotbed of apathy, will return to their everyday lives continuing to complain about the problems of the society in which they live.

Meanwhile, a few miles away in Belchertown State Hospital, people are still living in conditions unfit for human habitation. Inadequate care and the dehumanization of those who live in the state school is a common everyday experience.

In Monday's Collegian, Carole Weiner wrote about how true she found the articles about Belchertown to be and that she wished that maybe more persons could see what the conditions there are really like.

On the same page were two letters from two so-called student leaders urging the University community to get behind their efforts to provide them with a concert in the spring. Asking for money and support for a concert seems a little odd while we have a chance to provide money and support for the Belchertown suit.

Absurd is the only word that I can use to describe the priorities of the students on this campus. Student leaders asking support for a concert when a few miles away people, young and old, live in inhumane conditions which need change now.

Money is needed now by S.O.S. It is expected that the legal cost in taking the case to court will be outstanding and that the case could possibly be drawn out by the state in order to drain the funds of the 28 parents bringing suit.

Which does the University community consider more important? Does it favor an abandonment of the Concert Committee with the funds going to S.O.S. which I consider a more worthy cause? Or does it continue its support for the Concert Committee and our selfish needs for fun and entertainment while S.O.S. stumbles along lacking the student support ?

I ask those who have publicly supported the S.O.S. program and the Concert Committee to issue a public statement to the Collegian giving their opinions on the idea of abandoning the Concert Committee, and re-allocating those funds to aid in the suit by the 28 parents who have had the courage to fight the state in order to correct an evil that has existed for too long. This will be an ideal chance for the students of UMass to show that they really care about the world in which they live.

What will it be? A five hour entertainment fest for ourselves or much needed help for those who are unable to help themselves.

Index Loses A Round

By JAMES GOLD

UMass students came a step closer to losing their yearbook last night when the Budgets Committee of the Student Senate voted, 4-3-1, to recommend funding the Index in the amount of one dollar.

The vote came as an amendment while the Index representatives were presenting their total budget for next year.

According to Walter S. Sobzak, this year's Editor-in-Chief, two plans were proposed. The first was a hardcover edition which would cost about $50,000. The second was to publish a three-volume paperback.

Jack Koch, Index's Business Manager, said that the second option would allow for as a savings of up to 45% over this year's budget. This allows for only Seniors receiving volume three (the senior section). Plastic slip covers for these paperbacks would add $15,000 to the costs, he said.

If this budget is accepted by the full Senate later this month, no Index would be published next year.

Paul Doran stated in an MDC interview his reasons for making the motion which wiped out the funds: the Senate agreed in concept to fund the Index so that "a new and different concept" would be presented to the committee. "As presented, it was not," he said. Doran also expressed a personal opposition to the Index and stated that most people to whom he has spoken do not want an Index.

Sobzak called the committee's action "not representative of the student body." "We tried to cut as drastically as we could and still resemble a yearbook," he stated.

Koch pointed out that earlier actions by the Senate were only agreements to "listen to a budget recommendation".

Speaking generally, Doran said that Student Activities Tax Fund money is "spent on too many things." It was much lower several years ago, he added, "and I would like to see it back at that state."

When asked about other compus publications, Doran said that he thought they were all right.

Koch said that Doran did not consider 45% to be a substantial savings over this year's budget. He added that using the smallest most inexpensive option presented would give students a yearbook for about two dollars each.

Robert H. Quinn, Attorney General of Massachusetts, will speak to the University community in the Student Union Ballroom on Thursday, March 2, at 7:30 p.m. His talk will concern consumer protection and his role, and its affect on the people of the University of Massachusetts. A question and answer period will follow his address; and a coffee hour in the Colonial Lounge is planned.

Quinn Here Thursday

Attorney General Robert H. Quinn of Massachusetts will address the UMass community Thursday evening, March 2, 1972, in the Student Union Ballroom at 7:30 p.m.

The Attorney General will speak on consumer protection, his role, and its relevancy to UMass students, staff, and faculty. A question period will follow his address, and a coffee hour in the Colonial Lounge are planned.

Robert H. Quinn is the thirty-seventh Attorney General of Massachusetts, first elected in 1969. He directs the activities of eighteen divisions and sections in his department, and as Attorney General he serves a threefold function--lawyer for the people, legal counsel for constitutional officers and agencies, and chief law officer of Massachusetts.

Quinn is currently chairman of the Committee on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Criminal Justice, Chairman of the Eastern Region of the National Association of Attorneys General, and a member of its Executive Council, Chairman of New England Attorneys General and a member of the American, Massachusetts, and Boston Bar Associations.

From 1957 to 1969 Quinn served in the Massachusetts House of Representatives serving as Majority Whip (1963-1965), Majority Leader (1967), and House Speaker (1967-1969).

The Attorney General is a graduate of Boston College and Harvard Law School, and served as Law Clerk to Justice Harold P. Williams of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court.

Attorney General Quinn's speech is being sponsored by the Campus Center Program Council.

Chavez-Coke Agree

MIAMI (AP) — Cesar Chavez of the United Farm Workers union and the Coca Cola Foods Division of Florida announced an agreement Tuesday that provides for a three-year contract for 1,200 citrus grove and harvesting laborers.

The agreement is the first breakthrough in the California-founded union's eight-month effort to obtain recognition for Florida's estimated 150,000 seasonal and migrant workers.

Announcement of the pact drew response from citrus interests which clearly indicate they are not inclined to follow suit.

"We are proud of the contract-the first agreement in Florida and the southern part of the United States-and we hope it will open the gates with other companies and farmers in the state," said Chavez, who founded the union after years of strikes and boycotts in California vineyards, vegetable farms and fruit orchards.

The contract with Coca Cola covers 300 full-time and an estimated 900 seasonal agricultural employes at the company-owned Minute Maid Corp. fields in Auburndale, Fort Pierce, Indiantown, Avon Park and Frostproof.

It will go into effect Jan. 3, 1973.

Chavez said the present salaries for full-time workers ranged from $1.80 to $2.25 an hour. These would go to an hourly minimum of $2.25 up to $3.70.

Fred Adkinson, president of the Citrus Industrial Council, which represents virtually the entire industry, said of the pact: "I think it will prove very unpopular with the harvesting people in our state."

Student Trustees In Boston

Student Senate President Lee Sandwen and five other student trustees from the Commonwealth will be meeting today with Secretary of Education Joseph Cronin in Boston for a discussion of Governor Sargent's tuition increase plan. Informed sources have indicated that Cronin wants an endorsement of the Governor's plan, in order to release it with "student support"

Food Services Committee Petitioning During Meals

By HARRY STAVRO

A meeting of the Food Services Committee decided last night to petition students at all dining commons during the dinner meal Thursday March 9 to raise support for their organization.

Two members of the committee, Donita White and Mike Pipp, said that one purpose of the petition was to inform students that someone is working for them to better the food servicing.

The second goal of the petitions is to demonstrate to Joel Stoneham, director of the Food Services Program, that students are dissatisfied with the dining commons and its food. The committee plans to "bombard Stoneham's office" with the petitions. They hope for ten thousand signatures.

Another goal is to encourage student attendance at their weekly Tuesday night meetings in Room 903 of the CC. A bigger turnout will boost the imput of new ideas to better the Food Services Program.

After the petition drive, more concrete plans and options to change the Food Services Program will be developed. Currently, a five meal plan, a refundable meal ticket plan, and student-run dining commons are being considered.

Berrigan Informer Sought Bounty

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP) — Boyd Douglas Jr. sought a tax-free $50,000 reward from the FBI as its informer against the Rev. Philip Berrigan and six other antiwar militants, it was disclosed Tuesday.

The revelation led to a defense charge that the federal antiwar conspiracy trial of the so-called Harrisburg seven is "a frameup."

In a mystery letter to a person addressed only as "Molly," Douglas, a 31-year-old ex-convict, said he was asking that $5,000 be paid me the first week in December 1970 and the rest of it at the start of the trial or when things are blown wide open.

In return Douglas pledged to "help the government obtain enough evidence to prosecute these people concerned."

Berrigan and his six co-defendants are accused of conspiring in the summer of 1970 to kidnap presidential aide Henry A. Kissinger, vandalize draft board files in several states and blow up an underground heating tunnel in Washington, D.C.

The "Molly" letter came to light when the defense asked the court "to compel the government to reveal the records of any money transactions between Douglas and the Federal Bureau of Investigation or any other agency of the U.S. government.

"Motion denied," ruled U.S. District Court Judge R. Dixon Herman, who heard the matter in the absence of the jury.

In a subsequent news conference the defense claimed "Molly' was a cover man for FBI agent Delmar H. Mayfield Jr. Mayfield was one of two agents who initially prevailed on Douglas to turn FBI informer during a June 1970 rendezvous in a picnic area near the Lewisburg, Pa., campus of Bucknell University.

"This looks increasingly like a frameup instead of a judicial case," said one of the defendants, Eqbal Ahmad. "We are not told whether the demand was met fully, partially or in what way."

The letter was dated Oct. 3, 1970.

At the time, Douglas already was four months involved as an FBI informer in the alleged smuggling of letters in and out of Lewisburg federal penitentiary on behalf of his fellow convict, Berrigan.

The antiwar priest was beginning a six-year term for destroying draft records. Douglas was winding up a stretch for interstate transportation of fraudulent checks and assault on an FBI agent. He way paroled Dec. 16, 1970.

At the time the government says Douglas was a courier for Berrigan, Douglas was a study-release student at Bucknell and was permitted to leave and re-enter the penitentiary daily to attend classes.

Jenkins Claims Systematic Racism

By BRENDA GRAY

Covering many aspects of the life of the Black minority, from slaves picking cotton to drugs in the ghetto, Reverend W.L. Jenkins stated in a Student Union Ballroom speech last night that in 1972, only a few Blacks have been allowed to succeed in the system. The other millions are held down by a system in which racism is institutionalized.

His opening statement proceeded as follows. "What ever happens to a dream deferred? Dreamers are the saviors of the world. Black people have not found fulfillment of their dreams and that racism is going to exist as long as the Black community has no power to control its own destiny."

Rev. Jenkins also feels that education has not solved our problems.

In 1930 Black people made an exodus to the north from the south looking for a fulfillment of their dreams but soon they found out that the only difference between Mayor Richard Daley and the politicians of Mississippi is that his tenure is longer, he said. Rev. Jenkins went on to say that "Adam Clayton Powell was pushed out of Congress because he was said to be, by the white press, flamboyant and sassy. Something that white folks just couldn't deal with." He also spoke of professor Angela Davis, saying that, "when did it become a crime to have a philosophy that is contradictory to White Americans."

The Rev. Jenkins spoke to an audience of mostly black people and the right-ons were heard quite frequently. The fact that 30 billion dollars was spent on a moon mission and black people are still being treated in an inhumane way bothered him greatly and he felt that blacks must become aware of what is happening to their race.

He also mentioned that "75% of the people in prison are Black and they are only 11% of the population. The only way for the Black people to have their dreams come true is to realize that they very future of their children depends on what they do. "Blacks should know the difference between experiential blackness and academic blackness. Still Blacks are the last hired and the first fired." With the economic condition in America now, Blacks will find it even more increasingly difficult to find employment.

Rev. Jenkins feels blacks should "hold on" and not turn to drugs, which is only an escape from something that still exists when you come down from your high. To run away from a problem is not solving it. "Some Black folks are dangling in two psychological states of existence."

SUG Board-How Much Power?

By DON BISHOP

Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs, Robert Gage, feels that the current atmosphere of mistrust and discord between the SUG Board and the Administration is symptomatic of an "adversary situation" where "each side is trying to find out how much power it can have." As far as SUG Board is concerned, Gage feels that no one has really taken the time to define "what decisions the SUG Board can legally make."

In an MDC interview, Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs, Robert Gage, has expressed the opposing side to the SUG Board's view of the present difficulties.

Gage agrees that with the overwhelming majority of SU-Campus Center funds being supplied by students, students should have considerable policy-making power regarding the complex. He feels that the SUG Board at present has more policy-making power than it realizes, and that instead of exploring possible avenues of authority, the Board, by attempting to remove the Chancellor's veto power, has probably worsened relations between Administration management and Board.

In yesterday's Collegian, an attempt was made to describe the present difficulties between the Student Union Governing (SUG) Board, the Management of the Campus Center, and the Administration and the reasons for them. Briefly, a majority of the members of SUG Board feel that Acting Chancellor Bromery, along with other Administrators, have infringed upon the policy-making rights of the SUG Board through "misuse" of the Chancellor's right of veto over action of the Board.

The current problem over the Chancellor's recent frequent use of his veto option has a number of explanations, according to Gage. The Vice-Chancellor explains that one of the Acting Chancellor's vetoes was a mistake and has been rescinded. Another veto, relating to the SUG Board's ban on military recruiters in the Campus Center, has also been taken back, due to the Board's continued feelings against having recruiters in the complex.

In Gage's opinion, other vetoes have resulted from the Board's "interference with the management decisions of the Campus Center." It is around this point that the Administration and Board have come to disagree most often, with the SUG Board viewing some of their decisions as being strictly "policy" while the Administration sees them as incurring into areas of "management". Gage feels that no Board such as the SUG Board should be involved in the management of the building, and he feels that this is the present agreement between Board Administration and management as defined in the existing SUG Board Constitution.

Dr. Gage feels that there will eventually be a solution to the present difficulties, but for this to occur, serious discussions between the opposing factions will have to take place. Gage claims that his office is ready to begin on discussions immediately, if the SUG Board is willing to approach the issue without over-politicizing or publicizing it.

TA Program Funding Explained

By JEANNETTE MARTINEAU

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, Robert Gluckstern, and Associate Dean of the UMass Graduate School, Arthur Gentile, explained the funding of the TA program and the creation of the new Teacher Associate position to the Graduate Student Senate Monday night.

According to Vice Chancellor Gluckstern: "The Governor's budget recommendations allow for no new faculty positions...no new clerical positions." It does provide for new maintenance "because of the increase in footage with the new buildings."

The University payroll, Gluckstern explained, tends to have a "certain leftover at the end of the year." This savings is estimated and deducted at the beginning of the year. Consequently the University must plan on vacancies in order to accumulate a deficiency budget.

The TA's, particularly for the summer sessions, run substantially over their budget from the 03 account (i.e. part time employees). The creation of Teacher Associates as "high-level assistants...possibly as lecturers, ...from the 01 account," Gluckstern concluded, "would allow for greater autonomy in transferring money from one personnel account to another."

The Teacher Associate positions, which would involve a stipend of $3800 as opposed to the $3400 for next year's Teacher Assistants, would be "allocated to each school...to be awarded on the basis of seniority, experience, ability." Both Vice Chancellor Gluckstern and Dean Gentile urged the Grad Student Senators to volunteer in helping to select the Teacher Associates in their respective Departments. Dean Gentile described the new position as "incentive,...an opportunity to grow in his job."

In other developments at Monday night's meeting the issue concerning the establishment of the Department of Agriculture and Environmental Microbiology was tabled and sent to committee for recommendations.

Also Joe Sulvia from SOS explained the purpose of his organization to the Senate: "It's the system that we're attacking." The Senate proposed a motion to give SOS their support.

SUMMER JOBS FOR JUNIORS IN PHYSICS, CHEMISTRY AND ENGINEERING

The Department of Engineering and Applied Science of Yale University is offering a limited number of Special Grants to college juniors who would like to gain experience in advanced research this summer.

Available projects include work involving air pollution instrumentation, surface chemistry and catalysis, gaseous electronics, plasma physics, heat and mass transport, computer science and data processing, physics of fluids, ultra high speed photography, chemical physics, high pressure chemical synthesis, solid state physics and electronics.

Stipends will be in the range $100-$120 a week depending on experience, and will be awarded for a 12-week period from June 12th through September 1st, 1972.

For further details and application forms please contact your department office, Dean's office, or write to:

In The Nation And The World

Chou En-lai To Ask Senators To China

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon won congressional leaders' support Tuesday for the results of his mission to China. And he disclosed that the two top Senate leaders have been invited to visit Peking in a continuation of Sino-U.S. contacts.

The White House said Nixon received substantial support from the bipartisan leadership of House and Senate on his historic journey. This was borne out by comment from the congressional leaders who were briefed at the White House.

It was announced that Nixon feels he already has adequately filled in the American public on his accomplishments and impressions with China's leaders and seven days in that country.

DELETE ABOVE PARA.

It was announced that Nixon feels he already has adquately filled in the American public on his accomplishments and impressions after summit meetings with China's leaders and seven days in that country.

Press secretary Ronald L. Ziegler said the President was on nationwide television-radio with his statement Monday night and will have "no further report as such to the nation."

The big news at the White House Tuesday was Nixon's announcement to Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield, D-Mont., and Minority Leader Hugh Scott, R-Pa., that Chinese Premier Chou En-lai plans to invite them to visit China at a time that will be mutually convenient.

Both Mansfield, who served as a U.S. Marine in China in 1921-22 and was a professor of Asian history, and Scott, a collector of Chinese and other Oriental art, have previously expressed an interest in going to mainland China.

Ziegler said that at the last meeting with Chou in Shanghai, when the question of people-to-people contacts and exchanges between the U.S. and China was discussed, the premier said he knew of the interest of Mansfield and Scott in coming to his country.

Anti-Busing Act Halted

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate, with most of its absentees back in town, reversed itself Tuesday and rejected the Griffin amendment to strip the federal courts of power to issue busing orders in school desegregation cases.

The vote against it was 50 to 47, which compared with the 43-40 tally last Friday to adopt the proposal of Sen. Robert P. Griffin, R-Mich.

Three of the five Democratic presidential contenders who had been absent Friday returned for the test and furnished the margin of victory for civil rights advocates to reject Griffin.

The victory was not final, however. The Senate will continue to debate the higher education-school desegregation bill up to 2 p.m. Wednesday and another version of the Griffin rider or other stringent antibusing amendments still could be offered.

After rejecting the Griffin amendment, the Senate voted 63 to 34 to adopt again the plan offered by the Senate leaders, Mike Mansfield, D-Mont., and Hugh Scott, R-Pa., as a compromise. Later it sealed this into the bill 66-29.

It contains some mild restrictions on busing but does not challenge the power of the federal courts to continue to issue busing orders where the judge decide these are required to end state-imposed school segregation.

The three Democratic hopefuls who voted were Sens. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine, Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota and George S. McGovern of South Dakota. Each voted against Griffin and for the Mansfield-Scott compromise.

Opponents of the Griffin rider had described it as an unconstitutional attempt to deprive the courts of the right to use an important remedy for school segregation.

The rider had a second provision which would have killed a key section of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

This provision would have forbidden federal officials to withhold or threaten to withhold federal funds to induce use of busing in a desegregation effort.

Southern senators continued to describe the Mansfield-Scott compromise as meaningless. Some said it actually would produce more busing.

The compromise would leave it up to local school boards to decide whether to ask federal funds for busing to carry out desegregation orders and would bar use of federal money for this purpose when the busing would risk the health of the children or impinge on the educational process.

It also would prohibit federal officials from inducing local officials to use busing where students would be moved from good schools to poor schools, and it would stay until all appeals had been exhausted the implementation of any court order for busing across school district lines.

Women's Rights Amendment Clears Committee

WASHINGTON (AP)-The proposed women's rights amendment to the Constitution cleared the Senate Judiciary Committee Tuesday by a 15-1 vote after all attempts to water it down were rejected.

Approved by the House last October by a 354-23 vote, the amendment provides that equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex.

Soviets Tow Disabled Sub

NORFOLK, Va. (AP)-A Soviet nuclear-powered submarine apparently disabled in the North Atlantic 600 miles northeast of Newfoundland was taken in tow Tuesday by a Soviet tug, Atlantic Fleet headquarters reported.

Fleet headquarters received the report from a NATO maritime patrol plane flying from the NATO air base at Keflavik, Iceland.

McCloskey Calls Nixon Trip "A Travelog On National Television"

PLAISTOW, N.H. (AP)-Rep. Paul N. McCloskey said Tuesday that President Nixon "conducted a travelog on national television" during his China trip and "diverted the public's attention from the crucial issues of our times."

The California Republican told audiences at three southern New Hampshire high schools, "I respect the goal of this trip. I am glad to see the President beginning to break down the wall between us and the Chinese."

Blue Shield Cites Overcharge

WASHINGTON (AP)-Of every $25 collected by doctors last year, $1 was overcharge, new statistics indicate, and the grand total of excessive physician fees topped $500 million.

The National Association of Blue Shield Plans refused to pay 4 per cent of total doctor charges in 1971, $40 million worth, on the ground that they were too steep.

The overcharge works out to more than $500 million when the Blue Shield findings are applied to the $14 billion paid from all sources for physician services last year.

The larger estimate is properly drawn, health economists said in interviews, because of Blue Shield's representative experience.

The $40-million Blue Shield figure, made available to The Associated Press, is the first statistic to shed light on the issue of doctors fees.

Blue Shield, controlled largely by doctors, objects to the word overcharge. A spokesman insisted instead on calling the disallowed fees "reductions."

Asked for comment, the American Medical Association said in a statement:

"We would agree with Blue Shield that the word overcharge is misleading because it tends to create the erroneous impression have set out to deliberately defraud Blue Sheild and the public."

An "overcharger" is defined as a physician who bills in excess of the highest fee that doctors in his area consider and that Blue Shield therefore pays in full under its most comprehensive contracts. The $40-million Blue Shield reduction is the amount of charges rejected because they exceeded the limit negotiated by the carrier with physicians or their medical societies.

The AMA did not challenge Blue Shield's figures, but added that a survey some years ago "indicated that physicians were donating annually upwards of $600 million in free care."

No accurate count exists of overchargers. But economists, medical leaders and insurance executives offer the rough estimate that they number perhaps 2 per cent of the country's 279,000 practicing physicians.

Blue Shield also has a critical eye on the doctor who piles up unnecessary charges with a battery of diagnotic tests where a few would suffice; with too many visits to hospitalized patients; or with excessive injections and other treatments.

Citing "overutilization", Blue Shield plans regused to pay, or recouped, $25 million from doctor bills last year, 2.5 per cent of the total received.

Reductions for overutilization nationwide amounted to $63 million in 1971, Blue Shield estimated. The figure is in addition to the $40 million in overcharges.

Some critics say Blue Shield's 4 per cent estimate for overcharges is too low. One of them, Max Fine, executive director of the Committee for National Health Insurance, maintains that doctor fees are inflated 20 to 30 per cent.

Fine cites two surveys by the government's Bureau of Labor Statistics. One found that a third of all physicians raised their charges an average 21 per cent on the eve of Medicare for fear of susequent cost controls. The other showed fees of all physicians increased 39.7 per cent in the past five years, compared to a 25.1 per cent increase in the Consumer Price Index for all goods and services.

No Test Ban This Year

GENEVA (AP)-The United States told the 25-nation conference on disarmament Tuesday there can be no agreement on banning underground nuclear test this year. The statement appeared to spotlight the emergence of Red China as a nuclear power and its growing influence on issues of major import.

The U.S. delegate, Joseph Martin, Jr., made this statement as the conference resumed its work in Geneva. At almost any time up to now his statement might have been regarded as routine in the 14-year-old international search for underground explosions. But in the light of President Nixon's visit to China, the test ban question no longer can be considered an exclusive Sovet-American province.

The United States and the Soviet bloc have been at odds on how to police an underground test ban ever since negotiations on nuclear testing began in the British-Soviet-American talks early in 1958. The gulf remains despite a 1963 Moscow pact banning atmospheric and other tests long considered unimportant for continued nuclear weapons development.

U.S. Supports Satellite Expansion

WASHINGTON (AP) — A delegation of U.S. officials is en route to Europe with White House orders to reassure allies that the United States supports international cooperation in expanding satellite communications.

The journey comes a month after the White House rejected plans for a $140-million satellite system jointly owned by U.S. and European governments to improve air navigation on overseas flights-a decision that reportedly irked European allies.

The six-member delegation headed by Dr. George Mansur, deputy director of the White House Office of Telecommunications Policy, is seeking to soothe ruffled allied feelings and redefine cooperative programs using satellites to improve air-traffic control.

Officials said the delegation, which included representatives from the departments of State and Transportation and the Federal Aviation Administration, conferred with Canadian officials in Ottawa Tuesday. Then the group left for Spain, where talks with aviation ministry officials are planned for Thursday.

Although the officials did not disclose a precise itinerary, they said stops also are planned in West Germany, France and Britain. And, they added, a trip is planned in the near future to Japan and Australia.

The U.S. government is reported to be conducting a major review of its future satellite communications needs. Officials have indicated that even if a new cooperative plan cannot be worked out with European allies, an independent agreement might be reached with Asian nations.

Flood Devastates W. Va.

MAN, W. Va. (AP) — A National Guard spokesman has predicted that the death toll from the flood which devastated 16 coal mining camps here probably won't exceed 90. Seventy are known dead.

Col. William F. Maroney voiced the opinion Tuesday while the Guardsmen under his command continued to search Buffalo Creek Hollow for the estimated 250 persons still listed as missing or unaccounted for.

"Most of those that were reported missing are probably alive," but have not come out of the hollow, he said.

Guardsmen estimated there are now about 1,000 persons living in hillside houses which escaped Saturday's flash flood. Before an earthen and slate dam at the head of the winding Appalachian hollow gave away and sent water raging down it, approximately 5,000 people lived in that area.

Throughout the 17-mile hollow, or valley, National Guardsmen sifted through the debris in search of more bodies Tuesday. If they didn't find any, they set fire to piles of debris.

Red Cross workers tediously tried to respond to the needs of the residents, touring one area of Lundale to take names of family physicians in an effort to restore lost medicine to some of the people.

Soviets Attack Nixon's Trip

MOSCOW (AP) — The Soviet Union issued Tuesday its first sharp attack on President Nixon's trip to Peking, accusing China of "entering a dangerous plot with the ruling circles of the U.S.A."

An article in the Soviet trade union newspaper Trud dismissed Nixon's journey to China as a publicity stunt to capture votes in this election year.

Trud was the first of the controlled Soviet press to deviate from a cautious handling of the Nixon trip.

The thrust of the article was to portray Nixon and his Chinese hosts as conspiring to decide the fate of the North Vietnamese. The article said Nixon was counting on Peking for support of his Vietnamization policy in return for certain concessions.

"The whole world condemns the crimes of the American military in Indochina but is watching intently the activities of the Peking ruling Circles," Trud asserted.

"They are avoiding anything which would look like a criticism of the U.S.A. The leaders of China broke all records during Nixon's visit to ingratiate themselves to the United States. They tried to create a favorable impression of themselves in the eyes of those who guide the foreign policy of the largest imperialist power.

"This they have achieved. But they have also achieved something else: The entire progressive world, along with the condemnation of the activities of American imperialism against the peace and freedom of peoples, also condemns the Maoists for having entered a dangerous plot with the ruling circles of the U.S.A."

Trud's commentators castigated Nixon's Vietnamization policy and said it prompted the Chinese leaders to invite him to Peking.

"The fact is that they count on using the American policy of setting Asians against Asians for their own great power aims," the paper said. "It is characteristic that long before, during and after the visit, Peking did not even once condemn the acts of aggression of the U.S.A. in Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. Isn't it striking that Nixon's visit to Peking was accompanied by the rumble of bomb explosions?"

High Court Urged To Assume Pollution Role

WASHINGTON (AP) — Pollution is becoming so dangerous to health, the Supreme Court was told Tuesday, that the high court should assume an immediate and commanding role in some interstate fights over dirty air and water.

In three cases involving more than 30 states, the court was urged to assume jurisdiction before the legal battles move through the lower courts.

In one, Vermont wants New York to remove or cover over a mountain-sized sludge bed sitting in the middle of Lake Champlain, which borders on both states.

Vermont claims the 340-acre heap of decaying wood chips and organic material creates a great public nuisance which trespasses on Vermont's portion of the lake bed.

Also named in the suit is the International Paper Co. which for 45 years discharged waste into the lake from a now-closed plant at Ticonderoga, N.Y.

Though a new plant replacing the old one apparently is generating no fresh pollution, the sludge heap continues to consume oxygen, kill fish, inhibit boating and float in big ugly globs to the shore of the lake, the high court was told.

In a second case, 18 states are suing all of the major auto-makers, seeking to force them to install antipolution devices on 18 million cars built between 1953 and 1968 when federal law first required such devices on new autos.

Belchertown: Funds Needed For Reform

The following is the final segment of the "Tragedy of Belchertown" series which was printed in the Springfield Union two years ago. The series was authored by James Shanks.

In the event of fire, most of the Belchertown State School would become a crematorium.

The problems of staffing, overcrowding, and justifying new buildings would suddenly be solved. But the concern left in it wake about the mentally retarded would shake the Legislature.

There is no doubt funds for alternate programs such as nursery schools and sheltered workshops would immediately become available.

Yet a tragedy such as this should be avoided. Funds are needed to prevent it from happening. Money is needed to end the human warehousing of residents and the stifling of their development.

Appropriations are essential for new programs which will prevent the institutionalization of the retarded and enable them to live near normal lives.

Many of the residents at the Belchertown State School for the retarded have never known real privacy. (photo by Vinnie D'Addario)

In most areas of Belchertown only two attendants-sometimes only one-are on duty to care for an average of 100 residents during the night.

Two or three dormitories are in use in each of the buildings. Each has locked fire escapes. Most of the dormitories are on the second floor.

There are no sprinkler systems.

The beds are jammed together head to foot, up to four deep. Aisleways are often less than a foot wide. Little imagination is needed to understand what a fire would do under these conditions. What chance would people have who often are unable to dress themselves?

Rep. Alan D. Sisitsky, D-Springfield, has called for legislative involvement to correct the problems of Belchertown.

"There are many problems which the Legislature must deal with," he said. "But the conditions of institutions like this are the foremost priority.

"We need new buildings, more professional administration, additional staff, and more importantly a greater sensitivity and concern for what is going on at places like Belchertown," he said.

"People seem to be forgotten because of lack of staff. Not enough legislators have made this into a crusade. Most reform comes from legislators willing to work until improvements are made.

"I realize," he said, "that becoming aware of the problem and developing effective solutions takes time.

Legislators will have to stand up and be counted in Massachusetts before we have any improvement, he said.

A number of legislators visited Belchertown. They appeared horrified. They did nothing.

Relatively minor problems plague Belchertown because of a lack of legislative appropriations.

A new laundry should be built. People should also be hired to operate it. Residents who once did the laundry are not entering the institution in force because they are trainable and some are fortunate to remain in the community on other programs.

The laundry now sterilizes and mangles clothes, returning finished work unironed in large bags. Attendants spend an average of two hour per day sorting clothes. This takes away time which should be spent working with the residents.

Herbert Burrige, head nurse at Belchertown, confirmed that many residents at Belchertown are seriously emotionally disturbed. Most are psychologically normal when they enter. They develop the psychotic tendencies to blot out the humdrum life they must lead after they arrive at the institution.

"If you spent any time as a patient here, you would develop severe depression within the first two weeks. Then you'd probably become severely disturbed after a longer period of time," commented Dr. M. Phillip Wakstein, regional director of mental retardation.

To bring Belchertown up to the minimum standards of the American Association for Mental Deficiency, a group similar to the American Hospital Association, more than 160 nurses and attendants must be hired. That's an increase estimated at nearly 50 per cent.

The staff shortage is a permanent problem. Turnover averages 30 per cent. Until a few months ago, just hiring the staff permitted was almost impossible because of the low salaries paid. Vacancies sometimes amounted to nearly a quarter of the allotted staff.

A pay raise from $85 to $105 weekly was approved, causing the vacancies to be filled. But the number of employes permitted by the Legislature is far below the number needed to give quality care and education.

Staff quality has also been a serious problem. The low pay has hurt staff morale. Pay for professionals needs sharp improvement. Presently there are only 28 registered nurses attending 1300.

Some 68 positions for licensed practical nurses are now filled by attendants because nurses cannot be found at the present salary level.

Only two doctors, including the superintendent, Dr. Lawrence P. Bowser who devotes his time to administrative duties, are fully licensed to practice medicine. The others have licenses good only for working in state institutions.

There are no occupational therapists, trained recreational therapists or speech therapists-professions vitally needed by the retarded. There are only two psychologists for the entire school, neither with a doctoral degree.

Salaries for the doctors are low. The maximum for the chief psychologist or doctor is $17,000 per year. Anyone in private practice can earn three times that, or much more.

Wakstein, Burrige and other experts in the field believe Belchertown should be eliminated in its present form.

Buildings now housing residents should be converted to sheltered workshops employing and training the retarded, who would live outside the institution in their own homes or special group living centers.

They would receive training and make money at the same time, contributing something to their own support instead of being a $250,000 drain on the state during their lifetime in an institution.

Wakstein believes 90 per cent of the retarded now requiring some type of service from the state are able to live in the community. The remainder would require, because of their severely limited abilities, long term residential care.

The experts say this should be in "cottages" or living units of about eight persons with two or three staff members. This setup would make the most of their limited potential. It would also guarantee their treatment as human beings.

Such programs cost money. With the states reaching the limits of their taxing powers, Sisitsky calls for a massive infusion of federal funds.

"As these situations become aggravated, a reordering of these priorities from the federal government becomes critical. The federal government cannot ignore conditions of the states and the whole range of domestic problems which day by day become more serious."

Wakstein summed up the attitude of the Commonwealth in developing new programs in the community such as nursery schools, group living centers and sheltered workshops as one of "options."

"They say we can do these things some day, some week, some decade, that the options are always open. The options for other things besides Belchertown in state funds take precedence.

"But the options just aren't there anymore."

Wildlife Meets World Wednesday

WASHINGTON (AP)-The snow soon will melt in the high country, opening up narrow passes. Trees and shrubs will begin budding. Wildlife will begin moving with the warm spring breezes. And millions of people will invade the national parks, hoping to find the solitude and relaxation that only nature can provide.

Another season has begun, but no ordinary one for the national park system. Wednesday is the 100th anniversary of the founding of Yellowstone, the nation's first national park. And in this centennial year the park system faces problems of overcrowding, bumper-to-bumper traffic, smog, drugs and crime.

Hundreds of thousands of acres have been added to the national park system since President Ulysses S. Grant signed into law on March 1, 1872, a bill to preserve the scenic wonders of Yellowstone. But, says George B. Hartzog, Jr., director of the National Park Service, "I think we need a great deal more."

The park service controls over 30 million acres. They include natural areas such as Yellowstone in the West and Acadia on the Maine coasts, historical sites such as the Gettysburg battlefield, and recreation areas such as the Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore.

But some parks are strained to their limits.

The park service recorded over 200 million visits last year and more people are expected this year. They arrive in autos, in campers and on foot.

"I think we've got to face up to the fact that in some national parks we won't have any more recreational vehicle camping," Hartzog said in an interview.

Campers, he added, "are at the root of a great deal of our problems of crowding and congestion today because they're building these recreation vehicles ever larger and larger."

Private autos already have been banned in some sections of heavily visited parks. A concession-operated bus system transports people through the Mariposa Grove of ancient sequoia trees in Yosemite National Park in California.

Even at Mount McKinley National Park in Alaska, the service plans to ban private autos on the single highway leading to Wonder Lake and substitute a shuttle service. "That many autos going up and down that road will drive the wildlife into the high ground," Hartzog said.

"We smoked our brains the night before on cigarettes and songs that we'd been pickin'..."

Sarge Says He's Being Watched

BOSTON (AP)-Gov. Francis W. Sargent Tuesday said a newspaper report that he has been under surveillance by the Army was the first indication he had that he has been investigated.

Sen. Sam Ervin Jr., D-N.C., in a brief filed with the Supreme Court alleged that Sargent was among a number of civilian officials under surveillance by the Army at some time between 1967 and 1970.

At a news conference Tuesday afternoon, the governor said, "I clearly don't understand what this is all about."

Sargent said after reading the report that he got in touch with Sen. Ervin's subcommittee which has been studying Army intelligence operations. He said he received no indication of why he might have been under surveillance.

The governor told newsmen that those listed in the brief who allegedly came under surveillance were investigated "apparently because they spoke out about the war in southeast Asia or on civil rights matters."

Sargent said he doubted that the Army could have bugged his office. He also said the state police periodically check his telephone at his Dover home, and at the State House.

Governor Sargent claims that he is under surveillance by the Army. Sargent doesn't believe his office is bugged. He says the Police check to make sure.

Sarge Is In Charge

The Collegian condemns Gov. Sargent for his mysterious policies in dealing with UMass and the Belchertown State School for the retarded. In the true spirit of Massachusetts politics, Sargent has released his recommendations for the fiscal 1973 budget which includes major cut backs in the requested budgets for UMass and Belchertown.

Sargent has crawled out of his hole of isolation at the State House to recommend a 20 per cent cutback on the requested budget for UMass, and almost 40 per cent cutback on the requested budget for the Belchertown School. It is unfortunate that the leading politician in Massachusetts is prepared to sacrifice quality education at UMass in order to balance his $2 billion budget. It is obvious that the governor doesn't care whether the present 15-1 faculty to student ratio at UMass increases to 20-1 by 1980.

It is the height of hypocrisy when the governor would make close to a 40 per cent cut on the requested Belchertown budget without even visiting the school during his administration. It is shocking that Sargent would balance his almighty budget at the expense of humane living conditions at the school-unfortunately for the students of UMass and the children of Belchertown, "Sarge Is In Charge."

Hopefully, Gov. Sargent will be facing a concerned group of students when he speaks on campus March 7.

Minimum V. Maximum

Reform in the Massachusetts Penal correction system has been slow and tedious. State Representatives and Senators don't move unless pushed, thus student help is desperately needed.

The bill repealing the so-called 2/3 parole law proposes that time deducted for good behavior be taken from the minimum sentence rather than, as is done at the present, from an inmate's maximum sentence. Contrary to the arguments against the bill this would not result in the early release of many dangerous criminals. The time would be credited towards a prisoner's eligibility for parole; it is not that he would be granted parole.

The reasons for crediting good behavior to the minimum sentence are compelling. In many cases, the structure of the current two-thrids law denies consideration of the psychology of rehabilitation. To roughly 15% of the inmates in our institutions, parole is meaningless because the day when they become eligible for parole will come after, or very close to, the day when they will be released at the terminations of their sentence. This is in spite of statistics which have proven that the paroled inmate is less likely to be a repeat offender than the one who is released.

The repeal of the 2/3 law would encourage the inmate to achieve good behavior time by giving him the "hope" of parole. Next to food, hope appears to be an inmate's main staple. Without it he languishes in confinement, gradually becomes more embittered and hardened, and, once released, is more likely to return to prison.

In 1969, Parole Board Chairman Joseph McCormack resigned and called the present 2/3 law the worst piece of legislation he had to deal with in his term of office. The reason was that the current statute goes against an accepted theory that it is better to have more discretionary power within a correctional system, providing flexibility and the capability of handling exceptional cases. This new bill would increase the discretionary powers of the Parole Board by making more prisoners eligible for parole at an earlier point in their sentence.

Undoubtedly, some opponents of the bill will reduce the vote to a question of law and order versus permissiveness. It will be inaccurate and unfortunate because it is merely an attempt to rectify the inequities and weaknesses existing in the current law.

There is no doubt in my mind that the passage of this measure will bring us one step closer to a sound system of correction and one step further away from the desultory Devil's Island attitude of embittering, unreasonable confinement.

Any students who would like to defeat the present 2/3 law please contact Bill Manburg (5-2550), Representative Jonathan L. Healy (Room 489, State House, Boston), or write your state representative and state senator.

The Spirit Of Peking

WASHINGTON–The "Spirit of Peking" has had more of an effect on Americans than anyone would like to admit. For example, my Uncle Leo and Aunt Zelda, who live in Brooklyn, had broken off diplomatic relations with my Uncle Harry and Aunt Gertrude, who live in New Jersey, about 20 years ago.

No one is quite certain what caused the break, though rumor in the family had it that Uncle Harry had sold Uncle Leo some hospital insurance and Uncle Leo had been unable to collect on the policy because of some small print which Uncle Harry had neglected to mention to him.

Aunt Zelda called Uncle Harry a crook and Aunt Gertrude declared both Aunt Zelda and Uncle Leo persona non grata in the entire state of New Jersey.

The other day Uncle Leo's son, Henry, pointed out to his parents that if President Nixon could go all the way to Peking to normalize relations with Mao Tse-tung, they could at least take a crack at making peace with Uncle Harry and Aunt Gertrude.

Surprisingly Uncle Leo and Aunt Zelda agreed to open negotiations, and Henry went on a secret mission to the mainland of New Jersey to arrange the details.

Uncle Harry and Aunt Gertrude agreed to a state visit from Uncle Leo and Aunt Zelda, but they warned Henry not to get his hopes up over one trip. Henry went back to Brooklyn and reported he thought the climate was right for the visit, even if it did no more than to break the ice, which New Jersey had a lot of this year.

The date for the historic journey was set for last Sunday, and because of lack of transportation and the shortage of accommodations, I was the only newspaperman accredited for the trip.

Uncle Leo and Aunt Zelda brought along a staff consisting of their three children and their spouses.

We arrived at noon, New Jersey time. We were all disappointed to find there were no crowds in the streets as we drove up to the house, but when we got out of the car, Aunt Gertrude and Uncle Harry were there to greet us with their four children.

We went inside the house where we were each served a glass of California wine. Since no one had been to New Jersey for 20 years, we were amazed at the many changes that had taken place. Everyone seemed well fed and well clothed, and Aunt Zelda mentioned that Aunt Gertrude had even bought a new sofa since the last time we had been there.

The first thing on the agenda was dinner, and Aunt Gertrude served 14 courses. Uncle Leo and Aunt Zelda pretended they were enjoying every moment of it, though Aunt Zelda had made everyone eat before we left Brooklyn because she said, "You never know if they're going to feed you when you go there."

After dinner Uncle Leo made a toast in which he said that it was nice to be in New Jersey again after all those years, and while there were great differences to be settled in the family, particularly the question of what type of insurance Uncle Harry sold, he hoped the visit would bring about new relations between them.

Uncle Harry responded by saying that anyone who doesn't read an insurance policy is an idiot, but there were more important things in life than whether you can collect when you go to a hospital.

After the toasts Uncle Harry's 9-year-old granddaughter provided the entertainment by playing 14 numbers on the piano. Uncle Leo and Aunt Zelda applauded politely.

The highlight of the trip was a visit to Uncle Harry's "great" wall, which he had built in the back of his house to keep his neighbor's dog out. It was 4 feet high and 30 feet long, and Uncle Leo said he thought it was one of the great wonders of the world.

Community Auditions

By NEAL M. FELDMAN

Throughout the country higher education is being examined. One of the recurrent themes is the improvement of undergraduate teaching. The Report of the President's Committee on the Future University of Massachusetts cites the improvement of undergraduate teaching as a key objective. Committee suggestions for accomplishing this objective include:

1. A reward system which will give more weight to teaching excellence than was given in the past.
2. Improvement and broadening teach evaluation procedures.
3. Availability of faculty self-improvement apparatus, i.e., video tapes, a library of materials on college teaching, and seminars and workshops on teaching.
4. Establishment of a university Professoriate.

Each of these suggestions is intended to measure or improve the quality of teaching. Implied in the suggestions is the notion that bad can be made good, and good can be made better. This approach concentrates on improving the undergraduate teacher. It must be supplemented by better methods of choosing the undergraduate teacher. Bad teachers are hired more readily than they are fired or reformed. Once we have opened our classrooms to inept teachers we have a fait accompli–for at least a year.

To a considerable extent, teaching is a performing art. Performance is the measure of the artist. With most performing artists, training, research and creativity are culminated in the performance. Before receiving a contract the actor or musician must demonstrate adequate ability to the prospective employer. This is done at an audition. The medical practitioner has a longer audition called an internship. The college teacher is not auditioned. I can think of no other profession which hires people on a term contract with so little knowledge about their performance potential.

Any candidate for a teaching position should be auditioned. If he is being considered to teach Psych. 125, he should deliver a lecture to a regularly scheduled class in Psych 125. Judgment of his proficiency could be made by a committee of faculty and students using standards of adequacy that are appropriate to the Psychology Department's objectives. When it is not feasible to bring the candidate to campus for an audition, he should be auditioned by submitting a videotape of a lecture delivered on his own campus. This same procedure of auditioning prior to contract, is appropriate for our graduate students who are teaching undergraduate classes.

Letters To The Editor

Don't Eat The Daisies

To the Editor:

See the trampled grass. Hear about decaying ecology. Maybe you even speak about it. You see the trash, garbage and waste. Aren't you sick of it? There is environmental destruction all around. Don't go very far. See it here in UMass, your present environment, the carelessness of people, of everyone who says "who cares," "it doesn't matter," "as if I care," and other old and staid cliches. And you feel sorrow for the land, for the birds, the creatures, the people, for yourself and for your children.

When you see Nature's heritage being consumed, never to return, maybe a tear rolls down your cheek. Do you care? Show that you care; for, once lost, you may never get it back again.

I cannot gripe about the environment's quality in our forest-lands and waterways, unless I am ready and willing to start with my present situation. The only way we can make 'All America Beautiful' is by starting with this campus - our dorms, centers, offices, buildings and walks.

There is behavioral insensitivity of institutions to environment systems. Maybe a straight line is the shortest distance between two points, but there are times when this maxim just cannot be followed. The patches of green looked so beautiful early last fall. Now they are trampled into the cold, hard ground by cold, uncaring feet. Please help save our grass - it is the little bit of nature in this 'city of towers of steel and concrete.'

The question "why are recreational parks kept clean and not our campuses?" has been answered with the satirical statement that the parks are for recreation while the campuses are not. Is that a fair way of looking at things? Maybe this affluent society, having made a mess of the urbanized areas, does need a recreational park to see the country's beauty and wonder. But won't it be more fulfilling to bring that natural beauty into our city parks and campus environment? After all, how much does it take to put litter into its proper place, than throwing cans, bottles, papers, cigarette packets and the like all over campus? How much does it cost us to bring, even from our dorms, the recyclable paper and put it into the marked cartons kept for that purpose in the Student Union and the Campus Center, than to throw it into the refuse? Help us save our trees. This land has some of the richest forest areas in the world - let us keep it that way. We talk about 'Do we need the goods?' as opposed to our wanting them. "Over-consumption is the attitude of the American shopper, but just because we're best at it, it does not absolve us from the blame." We talk about waste; let us prevent waste now.

Katherine Lee Bates' 'America, the Beautiful' does not have to be restricted to out-of-town-limits, in-the-middle-of-nowhere, lost-in-the-woody-wonderland kind of paradise, but it is up to us as a part of society to make it a reality here.

Show that you care, Care for the Environment's Quality. It is your only heritage. Maybe you don't know where to start. Maybe you are unsure of what you could make your role in society, in this campus. You can be a creative participant, it won't take very much of you; but that little will go a long way when everyone is important. "No man is an island, no man alone can be free; for every man is a part of the main, and a loss of any part is a loss of me."

Do you care? Care to be a volunteer? Have you got an idea, a suggestion? Drop in for a rap - we are in the Coalition for Environmental Quality at 124 Campus Center, or call 545-0618.

After all, who's environment is it?

Slide, Kelly

To the Editor:

In accordance with a motion passed by the Campus Center, Student Union Governing Board on February 3rd the Building Manager of the Campus Center has been directed to make impassable the "slide" between the escalators in the concourse level.

The "slide", while quite popular with students, has resulted in many serious injuries, broken bones and sprained backs. Also, there is an obvious danger to people walking in the lower area of the escalator when people are sliding.

Therefore the SUG Board has reluctantly taken this action to have the slide closed.

Domino Theory

To the Editor:

Last Thursday, Feb. 24th, testimonies on abortion law repeal were heard before the Social Welfare Committee in the State House. The galleries were crowded with Catholics in uniform–nuns, priests, and nurses. Women from WONAAC, PCS, MORAL, and NOW spoke for repeal of Massachusetts' ambiguous and repressive abortion laws.

Mass. laws now say that it is illegal to have an illegal abortion. Court decisions have made abortions legal in cases where women can get a board of doctors or psychiatrists to decree physical or mental danger in pregnancy or childbirth. Both sides in testimony pointed out the hypocrisy of this. Only wealthy women have the money and contacts to apply these court decisions. Dianne Krane of MORAL testified that between July 1, 1970, and March 31, 1971, 3142 Mass. women went to N.Y.C. for legal abortions. She also reported that New York statistics show that the death rate is 4.4/100,000 women in legal abortions, while the maternal mortality rate is 35/100,000.

All day women told the stories of their illegal abortions where they received no proper medical care or were in great anguish because of the secrecy and danger involved. When one woman began, "You men (of the committee) will never have to go through it," a committeeman replied, "We have to shave!"

On the anti-abortion side, Rep. Marie Howe associated abortion on demand with fascism - outright slaughter - "next comes the slaughter of old people." Catholic leaders emphasized the rights of the embryo and fetus from the moment of conception as a living human person. They protested to women having an abortion at their "mere whim or convenience - having an untrammeled right to do as they please with their bodies." Some people in the galleries were appalled at the selfishness of women who testified that they did not, at certain periods of their lives, desire to bear children.

Senator Dorothy Doyal of Maine spoke of Catholic lobbying power. Her bill to repeal abortion laws in Maine has been defeated in 1967 and 1969, although the defeat margin has greatly decreased. She said the money and power of the Church in working against such bills which effect individual women was sometimes "beyond the realm of good taste."

It is very unlikely that repeal bills, Senate 842 and House 635, will pass this year in Massachusetts, considering the heavy male, Catholic domination in the Legislature. But women all over New England are demanding this right to control their bodies, and if the domino theory ever worked, we will make it start here and knock down repressive laws everywhere.

Editorial Points

After thinking it over, the Collegian decided that it might not be such a good idea to run dining commons menus in advance. It seems that the element of surprise is the most attractive part of a D.C. meal.

As reported earlier in the Daily Collegian, the buildings at the Belchertown State Hospital are unnamed. Why not name a few of these buildings after State House personalities? Perhaps then those whose names are attached to the buildings may take steps to correct the conditions in the buildings bearing their names.

They Loved It

To the Editor:

Monday, February 28th, the "Editorial Points" expressed hope that the University staff secretaries enjoyed their free dinner the previous Wednesday in the Campus Center, paid for out of student funds. I would like to join them in their wish and at the same time explain the rational which justified this occasion.

Actually the "dinner" was lunch and a working lunch, to be sure. Further, it occurred Friday, not Wednesday.

These secretaries are the people on campus most frequently delegated the job of booking special functions on behalf of the department and the professors or administrators for whom they work. Since it is all but impossible to talk to these secretaries at length except at lunch time, we invited them to lunch and at this time we introduced them to the Campus Center as a special function facility for both Food Service and Hotel rooms. We introduced them to the people with whom they would be dealing when they book special functions and we distributed the price lists and booking procedure for the functions at the Campus Center.

As there is no University policy which commits all University function business to be held in the Campus Center, I feel it is imperative we seek this business using positive action. This Catering business, as well as that brought to us by student groups, conferences and Alumni organizations, is a major part of our budgeted sales. In turn, it should be noted that profits derived from the Catering business serve to reduce student fees for the Campus Center.

First Class UMies

To the Editor:

We are Apathetic Umies, First Class, but even we can't let this issue just die. We always figured before, well what the hell, we give Mobe our four cents, or whatever their share of our student fees are, but we're too busy with other things to do more, and anyhow, they always manage to find someone to crank the mimeograph handle.

Yeah, well now they won't even have paper for the mimeograph and we hope it's not too late for us to do what we should have done before.

Nixon has finally begun to pay lip service, with his "limited withdrawal" and "peace proposals", to the antiwar feelings of the majority of voters in this country. He knows which way the wind is blowing. But now is the time to let him know that we demand Out Now we mean Everything and every person out right now this minute – and what do we do but withdraw our support of the most active antiwar group on this campus.

I hope some Mobe worker will publish the when and where of the Senate meeting which will reconsider the funding issue, because we'll be there early to have a talk with our representatives, and stay late to make ourselves heard. It's the least we can do to help stop the murder done in our names in S. E. Asia. We hope it's not too late.

Take A Walk

To the Editor:

Take a walk. Through Southwest, Orchard Hill, or perhaps Northeast. It doesn't matter. You pass by the icy trees, under the street lamps, hearing the animated talk of those who pass, into the complexes themselves, looking into windows, into the rooms, with their bright decorations and painted walls, hearing the music, maybe even tasting the popcorn or grinders satisfying those late night munchies. You see faces, smiling, or sad, but alive, even though it is chilly outside; you know you'll soon be back in your room, talking with your friends, safe, sound, and secure, your records at your fingertips. You know you're at a state-supported school, but somehow it really doesn't seem to matter.

Take another walk, through another state-supported school; this one is in Belchertown. Pass under the large trees, over the cracked pavement, and feel your own shadow chase you in the eeriness of what seems another world. Listen to the quiet, smell the antiseptic of a state school, taste the tasteless meal eaten for supper. Look into the windows, and find no bright decorations, no popcorn or grinders, no plastic electric entertainment. And pass, you dare, those out walking, and see not the smiles, or even the tears, but the blank look of those who may never be alive.

Then return to your room, and argue over the din of J. Geils, Dave Mason, Mountain, King Crimson, or Quicksilver, about which group you want to see in concert here, the mustard hanging from your chin to drip onto your brand new vest, thinking not about the $12,000 to be spent, spent to fill the mouths of those who least need it, spent to fill your head with that live music you will leave, only to go back to your room, to play your stereo anyway. And so away travels your money, painlessly, quickly, uselessly.

And while you're sitting there griping about the State, and all those nice trite 1984-type fears floating around in those fine liberal minds, there are some people working to change the inhumane conditions at the Belchertown State School. They are students fighting in the courts to settle an issue, to help those unable to help themselves, those unable to listen to a record, those people hardly able to worry over how to waste $12,000. But these people, in the form of the Students Offering Support (SOS) Committee, need money to continue the battle; and at this point, $12,000 would be awfully useful.

I am not trying to preach a cause - such is not my intent. I am merely trying to press a point home, attempting to present in some way the utterly absurd show of hypocrisy as represented by the MDC, an hypocrisy undoubtedly practiced by too many of us students on this campus, including those in the Student Senate - that dichotomy of supporting from one side of the mouth the nobility and necessity of the SOS battle, while on the other side debating a concert. It just doesn't make sense.

Take a walk, and do some thinking, if only for once in your life.

Action Against Poverty

By MARY GOODYEAR

"Students are being given the opportunity to alleviate poverty," said Dr. Ruth Bergen, director of the University Year for ACTION (UYA) at UMass, in an MDC interview on the student volunteer program.

The basic objective of the UYA, said Dr. Bergen, is "to alleviate poverty through the application of a university's resources to the problems of poor people in the communities which surround it." Secondly, the UYA is designed to assist universities in providing their students with an experience-based curriculum. The objectives are achieved by having students receive academic credit for working in poverty areas.

Each of the students involved in the UYA program receives thirty credits and $3,000 for his expenses, which include his tuition at the university he is attending, for his full year of work. Funds for UYA are supplied by ACTION, the government program, under which are also the Peace Corps and Vista. In many cases, the money allotted to the students does not meet their need and they must find additional work.

Students participating in UYA come from all major fields. The students involved at UMass come from such study areas as health, speech, physical education, government, history, Afro-American studies, English, and agriculture. The jobs to which they are assigned cover even a greater variety and hit upon teaching, tutoring, giving legal aid, and aiding in youth recreation programs.

At UMass, there are now 84 students working in the UYA credit program, 50 started last September when the program was first put into effect. The percentage of undergraduates is about equal to the percent age of graduate students working in the UYA. Students are selected for participation in the program according to the amount of money available from the government. At UMass, Boston, 30 students are enrolled in the program, tackling poverty problems in the Boston area.

Technically any full-time student at the University who is passing academically is eligible for participation, but Dr. Bergen added: "I feel from my vantage point and as others feel, that a student needs to be here for two years to get a feel in those two years of what he wants to do. We usually start at the Junior level and on up." Exceptions can be made through the use of references of faculty advisers.

The two year wait before entering the program is mainly for the protection of the student, and is a time for him to build up the strength and confidence necessary. Also basic University requirements should be fulfilled prior to participation in the UYA, as "graduation is paramount," according to Dr. Bergen.

Students come to the University to graduate and that is what she wants them to do. Some students get so involved in the program they don't want to return to campus and finish their academic requirements. Dr. Bergen said with emphasis, "I don't want to see that happen to any one of our students."

The effectiveness of UYA cannot be measured until at least August when the first students involved will have completed their year of service. Further expansion of the program will occur as soon as the funds are available. Dr. Bergen remarked, "we would like to expand so we can include a significant number of students on campus." However effective the program is in alleviating poverty it should prove to be an invaluable experience to the students involved.

Share An Evening With Lions Share

The Lions Share Co. is the area's only resident musical theatre company making its home at the Campus Center UMass. On March 2, the Lions Share will begin its presentation of Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt's CELEBRATION which is much on the same line as their FANTASTICKS. CELEBRATION's theme of nature versus urban corruption is augmented by its stylized characters, dynamic mime ensemble work where the actors cause a change of mood or scene, and its exciting, current percussive music and dance. This musical will be performed in cabaret style in the Campus Center Auditorium with beverages served.

The Lions Share Co. which was founded in Boston three years ago by Frank and Judi Anderson, performs every Saturday night at the Blue Wall with musicals such as CHARLIE BROWN, JACQUES BREL and STOP THE WORLD. Starting April 3 they will perform at the Top of the Campus Restaurant with a dinner theatre presenting JACQUES BREL, YOU'RE A GOOD MAN CHARLIE BROWN, STOP THE WORLD and MAN OF LA MANCHA.

CELEBRATION will open on March 2 with a performance at 8:00 and continue on March 3, 4, 10, and 11 with 7:30 and 10:00 performances each night. Tickets can be obtained through the UMass Student Union Ticket Office, 545-2006. Students with ID's-$1.50, all others $2.00. Tickets can only be purchased at the door.

Free University Set Up For Jews

By CAROL MacGREGOR

UMass has a new "free university." One which has been set up for Jewish students.

The courses offered cover the Hebrew alphabet, keeping Kosher, leading a service, pacificism in Jewish tradition and also Black Jewish history. Merkabah University, a "Free University of Electric Jewish Thought", offers training in these and other subjects pertinent to the Jewish community.

Merkabah University began its program Feb. 14. According to its coordinator, Geoffrey Levine, the response has been "tremendous, relative to previous years". "Many of the students involved have condemned the American Jewish establishment and hate the idea of the Jew as money-monger," said Levine. Of the 24 courses offered, the most popular has been "The American Jew, or Jewish American", which deals with Jewish identity problems in America and with anti-Semiticism.

Counseling Applications

Applications for Summer Session Student Assistants (counselors) are presently available in the Office of the Central Area Director in Baker House Basement. Applications must be in no later than March 15, 1972.

We want your body.
In New Hampshire.
This week.

And not for skiing.

The New Hampshire presidential primary is on March 7.
That's Tuesday of next week.
We're not going to try to sell you on Sen. George McGovern for President.
But if you already understand that Sen. McGovern represents the last, best hope for sanity among the Democratic candidates. . .
Then we want your body in New Hampshire this weekend.
The work's not difficult or unpleasant . . . just hard. Evenings, you're on your own. (They call it "apres-ski" in New Hampshire, and it's not exactly boring either.) If you can show up before the weekend and stay through Tuesday, you're golden with us, but any time you've got, we'll take.
And we'll take you anytime . . . starting right now. Call us at 723-7913 and we'll arrange to truck you on up to New Hampshire. (A bus is leaving from Boston City Hall at 8 a.m. on Saturday . . . other times, we'll make arrangements.)
You don't need a dime to join this crusade. No cost for food, lodging or transportation. (But if you've got a sleeping bag, bring it.)
Call us right now and tell us you're joining hundreds of others who will bus to New Hampshire this week to elect a President.
President McGovern.
You can't afford to wait another four years.

African Film Festival Set For Friday

Mandabi will be shown Friday at 7 p.m. in Herter Hall, this Friday.

A two-day African Film Festival, featuring films, slide presentations, panel discussions and art exhibits will be held Friday and Saturday, March 3 and 4, in Herter Hall and the Student Union. This Festival is sponsored by the UMass Fine Arts Council in cooperation with the Center for International Education, Dept. of Education, UMass.

On Frdiay, March 3, the classical "Mandabi", by African writer and film-maker Ousmane Sembene and the politically oriented film, "Medina Boe" will be shown in Herter 227 at 7:00 p.m. and 8:30 p.m. The films will be repeated at 9:30 and 11:00 p.m. A panel discussion on "African Liberation" will be held in Herter 227 at 9:15 p.m., led by Mr. Dingaan Maleka, Political Science Dept., Boston State College, and other UMass African Students. A display of West African sculpture from the collection of Elmar Siebel will be on exhibit in the lobby.

The Festival will move to the Student Union Building on Sat., March 4, for a full day of activities. Starting at 2:00 p.m., the films "New Images, Art in Changing African Society," and "Duro Ladipo," a documentary on the life and activities of Duro Ladipo, the founder, director, playwright, composer, and principal male actor of the Duro Ladipo Traveling Theatre Company of Oshogbo, Nigeria, will be shown in the S.U. Ballroom. At the same time, a slide presentation, "Africa: Myths and Realities" will be shown in the Commonwealth Room of the Union and a program of films and discussion on "African Village Life" will be presented in the Council Chambers Room.

At 3:00 p.m., the film "Black Girl" by Ousmane Sembene will be shown in the S.U. Ballroom. It will be followed by a discussion of the work by Ousmane Sembene as writer and film-maker led by Thomas Cassirer, Classics Dept., UMass, in the Council Chambers Room at 4:00 p.m.

A Demonstration/Workshop on "African Music" will be led by Marcia Perkins in the Commonwealth Room at 5:00. The workshop will be limited to 25 persons, and those desiring to attend should sign up in the Fine Arts Council Office, 125 Herter Hall.

The films, "New Images, Art in Changing African Society" and "Duro Ladipo" will be repeated at 7:00 p.m. in the S.U. Ballroom. At 8:00 p.m., the powerful political film, "Phela Ndaba" (End of the Dialogue) will be shown in the Ballroom. The final event of the African Film Festival will be a panel discussion on "Apartheid in South Africa," led by Miss Sebiletso Mokone, Communications Dept., Graham College, Boston.

Admission to the films will require the purchase of a daily ticket, allowing the holder entrance to all films shown on that day. UMass Undergrads $1.00; Others $2.00. The slide presentations and discussions will be open to the public, free of charge. Daily tickets are available in the Fine Arts Council, 125 Herter Hall, Tel. 545-0202. Remaining tickets will be available at Herter and the Student Union Ballroom one hour before the start of each day's programs.

Harrison Injured

LONDON (AP) — Former Beatle George Harrison and his wife Patti were injured Monday night when their car struck a crash barrier dividing a super highway near London.

Harrison, 29, had blood streaming down his face and his wounds were stitched at Maindenhead Hospital. Patti, 27, was treated for a concussion.

A hospital spokesman said: "They have had a lucky escape. The injuries do not appear to be serious."

The accident occurred during a power blackout that doused highway lighting systems.

St. Louis Orchestra Will Play Monday

The UMass Fine Arts Council Celebrity Series will close its 1971/72 season Monday, March 6, with a concert by The Saint Louis Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Walter Susskind.

The concert will be at 8 p.m. in Curry Hicks Cage on the UMass campus.

Maestro Susskind has selected a program designed for both students and non-students, and including Symphony No. 9 in D by Gustav Mahler and the Symphony No. 40 in G Minor by Mozart.

Recognizing the international resurgence of interest in the music of Mahler, particularly among young people, the University's Fine Arts Council prevailed upon the Orchestra's management to include this major orchestral work on the program. The Orchestra agreed, in spite of the necessity to fly an additional group of brass players to Amherst for this concert, since the work will not be performed elsewhere on The Saint Louis Symphony's eastern tour.

Tickets for the Saint Louis Symphony Orchestra's concert are available by contacting the Fine Arts Council, 125 Herter Hall, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, Mass. 01002. Telephone (413) 545-0202. Prices are $1 to UMass undergraduates, $2 to other full-time students, $3 to UMass faculty/staff and $3.50 to the general public. Mail orders for this concert will be accepted and should be mailed to the above address with checks made payable to the UMass Fine Arts Council. Please enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope for ticket return, and allow 10 days for mailing.

The St. Louis Orchestra will play at the Cage Monday at 8 P.M. Come on down to dig their vibes.

Student Art Meeting

The Student Art Association is holding its first general meeting this evening at 7:30 in the Campus Center room 175. The program will include two films and a discussion of the events forthcoming this semester. The first film, The Daybooks of Edward Weston, "How Young I Was", portrays his soft-focus portrait period, his abstract motifs, and the work he did in Mexico. The second film, "Visions of William Blake" illustrates the poetry, prose and pictures of the artist.

In April the Association is planning a student art show, mixed media. There will also be a Spring "Happening", and all meetings will include either films or panel discussions with both graduate students and faculty. Anyone interested in joining please attend this first meeting.

Third French Lecture Tonight

The third in a series of lectures on French civilization reflected in literature will be given Wednesday evening, March 1, at 8:00 in Herter 231 by Professor Christian Garaud. Professor Garaud is a specialist in the literature and civilization of the 17th century France—the French "grand siecle" or "classical age"—and he will speak on the image of man reflected in French classical literature.

These lectures are being given in response to student request; they are aimed at a student audience, not an audience of specialists.

Nursing Meeting

There will be a meeting at the School of Nursing Conference Room on Thursday, March 2, 1972, from 3:30-4:30 p.m. All nursing students are invited to meet Dr. Eileen Flynn, a candidate for Dean of the School. Punch and cookies will be served and there will be a chance to talk informally with Dr. Flynn.

Dr. Flynn is a graduate of the Johns Hopkins School of Nursing and obtained her Ph. D. from New York University. She is currently a Research Fellow in a Health Services Project at Yale University, Institute of Social Science. Please come and meet her!

by SYDNEY OMARR

Sagittarius, at times, gives impression of knowing all the answers. People react in various ways. Some are resentful, but some admire appearance of confidence. Very few persons are indifferent where Sagittarians are concerned. Sagittarius is especially good in inancial area for those born under Scorpio. There is attraction between Gemini and Sagittarius which often leads to marriage. Some famous persons born under Sagittarius include William Buckley, Ramsey Clark and Marla Cailes.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Protect what is dear to you. Marriage, home, special relationships--these now require delicate handling. In business, contracts are subject to change. Maintain sense of values. Patience now becomes great ally.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Long-standing debt could be repaid. Accent is on relations with co-workers, how you achieve basic purpose. Maintain steady pace. Avoid extremes. Be moderate in eating, drinking. Slow and easy should be theme.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Lovers' quarrel is on agenda--if you so permit it. Use energies in more constructive manner. Don't argue with persons who are frustrated, angry. Live up to obligations, responsibilities. Capricorn is in picture.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Domestic routine could be disrupted. Some relationships are reaching conclusion. Don't feel you must hang on to past. The world is out there in front, not back--step forward toward a new, vibrant life.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Hold off on journey, project which comes about through suggestion of relative. Necessary now for you to draw upon own resources. Creative energy will flow if you remove mental block. Be yourself.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You may have to give up something to gain momentum. Take a step back in order to take many steps forward. Finances improve, but first you have to streamline procedures. Tear down so that you can rebuild.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): What was a restriction is dissipated. There now can be greater freedom of thought, action. Get around. See and be seen. Impressions you make are definite. And you could impress one who will play meaningful role in your life.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Shake off tendency to be fearful. Meetings that occur behind your back actually will be beneficial. Hold something in reserve. Means don't reveal all you know. Join in community project. Leo, Aquarius persons are involved.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Some friends confide preposterous notions. Don't cast first stone. Be analytical. In actuality, someone is handing you something on proverbial silver platter. Accept social invitation. Obtain hint from Libra message.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan 19): One who attempts to dominate his ulterior motive. Realize this and respond accordingly. Protect self in clinches. Keep promises to family member. Taurus and Libra persons figure prominently.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Unusual communication could start chain of unusual events. Accent is on communication, travel, writing. Pisces person can aid. Plans subject to quick change. Have alternatives at hand. You will be stimulated.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Take care with investments. One who talks of sure thing is actually beset by doubt. Fulfill goals by being responsible. Shortcuts now are costly. Mate, partner may be misguided in money affairs.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are an original, creative thinker. Your life takes new turn in 1972, with March and December indicated as key months. If single, marriage is likely. If married, there could be an addition to family. Married or single, you will be happier there will be travel and greater recognition. Creative endeavors succeed.

Girl Skiers Second At Mittersill

This weekend, February 26th and 27th, the women's ski team raced at Mittersill. Due to poor weather conditions Saturday's giant slalom was cancelled. Sunday the two run was held, and the team placed Second, with UNH 1st, Bradford 3rd, and BU 4th. Christie Sweeney won and Cindy Rosati and Barbara O'Reilly finished with good times, making the three people needed for the team score.

Coach Bill MacConnell displays the Osborne Division Trophy won by the UMass Men's Ski Team with a 53 to 3 win-loss ratio in division competition against B.C., B.U. Northeastern, Tufts, Amherst, AIC and Bentley College.

For the past few weekends, the girls have been competing against eight other colleges in the Women's Intercollegiate Ski Conference. The season started out with several training days at Berkshire East, followed by a racing clinic, Saturday, and a two run slalom, Sunday, February 6th at Berkshire East. The team placed Seventh, but individually, Christie Sweeney won. The other girls on the team are Diane Evans, Jean Hayden, Barbara O'Reilly, Marcie Packlick, Mary Frances Sullivan, Pat Visnicki, and Co-captains Barbara Eaton and Cindy Rosati.

On the weekend of February 12th and 13th, the girls were at Roundtop. Saturday's competition was a one run slalom in which Christie Sweeney placed 2nd, Barbara Eaton 17th, Cindy Rosati 18th, and Marcia Packlick 19th. As a team, they took Third, with UNH 1st, BU 2nd, and Wellesley 4th. A two run slalom was held Sunday with UMass placing Fourth, while UNH was 1st, Merrimack 2nd, and Wellesley 3rd. The UMass team placings were Barbara O'Reilly 6th, Marcia Packlick 7th, Christie Sweeney 15th, and Jean Hayden 20th.

Next weekend, March 4th, the women's ski team will compete in its last two races of the season, at Pat's Peak.

JV Girls Lose

This season definitely has not been kind to the UMass J.V.'s as they fell, literally, to the Mount Holyoke J.V.'s Monday night, 35-18.

The game produced more basketball ineptitude than is polite to mention--suffice it to say the winner was the team who stayed on their feet longer and made fewer mistakes.

The game progressed normally enough through the first period, and by the half it was even fairly close. UMass trailed by a mere 11 points (26-15) and were psyching themselves for a comeback.

But Holyoke opened the third quarter with a scoring binge that left UMass bewildered. They could find their own basket just once for a score during the whole period and at the same time had considerable difficulties in staying on their feet. Ankles collapsed, feet came out from under people, players charged into opponents, teammates and an occasional official or two for a basketball exhibition that was truly unique. All the UMass frustration was reflected from the scoreboard at the end of the quarter, 35-16.

Either out of sheer exhaustion or extreme panic, the finesse of the previous periods was abandoned in the last quarter to a more gung-ho type play which, in turn, became a comedy of errors. Basic skills such as dribbling and passing were forgotten in the wild scramble by both teams for points. Holyoke was held scoreless in this last frame but UMass failed to capitalize on this, hitting for only 2 points themselves, and absorbing the 35-18 defeat.

Fairly decent first half performances for UMass were given by Sheila Higgins with a top total of 5 points, and Lorraine Harvey, Sherrie Kowarsky and Kathy Dowd with 3 points apiece.

The J.V.'s will tackle (not literally we hope) UNH in their final game of the season on Monday, March 6, in Durham.

Playoffs

The first playoff game at home in the history of UMass hockey will be played this Saturday at Orr Rink. The UMass opponent will most likely be St. Anselm's. Game time is going to be 3 p.m.

Tickets for this game are available at the ticket office in Boyden and prices are $1.50 for students and $2.00 for General Admission. There are a limited number of tickets available on a first come, first served basis.

Commentary
The Seals' Deal

By ROY LYONS

The question mark the California Seals recently acquired in the person of Reggie Leach is hardly intriguing. It's obvious that the Seals feel the young right wing's potential can be fully developed with more ice time. Much more bewildering is the future of Bob Stewart, a minor leaguer whose departure seemed to have little impact on Boston fans.

Stewart's problem this season has been his inability to curb a violent temper. The braves' season opener against the Cleveland Barons was barely underway when he erupted at the expense of a hapless Baron. (Unlike Keith Magnuson, Stewart wins his fights.) The pattern was established, and it eventually cost him a demotion to Oklahoma City in the Central Hockey League. In Boston his zest for body contact frequently led to needless penalties. It also led to an abandoning of positional play at critical times, leaving Brave netminders to contend with unguarded opponents. In short, his play typified the Bruins of ten years ago, when games were seldom won and fights seldom lost. Indeed, Bob Stewart would have thrived in the pre-Orr atmosphere of Boston Garden. He probably would have endared himself to the Boston fans just as such notorious brawlers as Reggie Fleming and Orland Kurtenbach did.

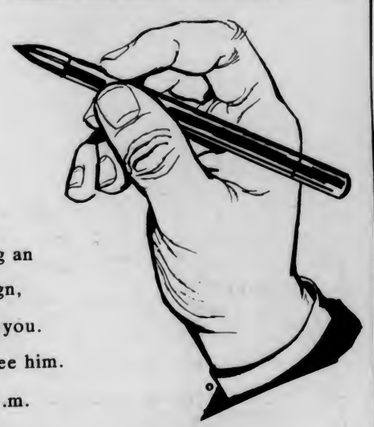
Occasionally there is a real need for a team policeman on a professional hockey team. Clearly, that was the role Fleming played in Chicago before the Blackhawks traded him to Boston. It was the role John Ferguson played for the Montreal Canadiens. Unfortunately for Stewart, this is hardly a necessity in Boston where both the Braves and Bruins have enough rugged individuals to compensate for the absence of a team cop.

There are numerous cases of players who found themselves in Stewart's dilemma. Such celebrated "reformers" as Vic Hadfield and Derek Sanderson soon found that their value to the team did not lie in pummeling opponents in fistic encounters. Some players, however, never do reform. Howie Young's temper kept him firmly mired in the minor leagues, despite obvious major league ability.

Bob Stewart is young and it's very possible that he will follow in the route of Hadfield and Sanderson. If that happens he may replace Leach as the trade's real sleeper.

Stilt's Bed "Launched"

NEW YORK (AP) — When they build a bed for Wilt Chamberlain they don't just throw together a mattress and a headboard. They launch it.



The way they launch ships.

Such was the case Tuesday when Marriott's Essex House, where President Nixon occasionally stays, announced that it was commissioning a bed made especially for the 7-foot-1 pro basketball star of the Los Angeles Lakers.

They did everything but bust a magnum of champagne over the bed post.

UMass Loses YanCon Lead

By FRANK ANTOSIEWICZ

KINSTON,RI–UMass falls one-half game behind the University of Rhode Island as a result of last night's loss by the score of 71-63.

The whole story of the game centered around the following situation: URI hit 29 free throws as opposed to seven for the Redmen. UMass did not have a single two shot foul situation throughout the whole game, while Rhody continually capitalized on charity stripe points.

Chris Coffin and Mike Pagliara played a strong second half to make the affair a close one. Al Skinner fouled out of the game two minutes into the second half with 15 points. His counterpart, Bob Young of URI fouled out 10 minutes later with 10 points.

The first half was all Rhody and they ran up a nine point lead, 37-28 at halftime. Skinner had 12 points in the opening half to make it a ballgame, but in the process picked up four fouls. The Rams also ran into foul trouble early, with Young collecting three fouls in three and one-half minutes.

A rock-'em-sock-'em affair characterized the first half as each team resorted to the slow-down, drag-out type of game. The Redmen intended to run, but the bigger Rams controlled the game, surprisingly enough, with a 50% average from the floor as opposed to UMass' 34%.

What was expected to be the key, rebounding, was neutralized as the Redmen had 18 and URI 17 in the first half.

The Rams played totally different in their home territory than they did in the Cage 10 days ago. Rhode Island native Steve Rowell led the home team with 20 points, followed by Phil Hickson with 14. Skinner was high man for UMass, followed by Mike Pagliara and Chris Coffin with 10 each.

The loss drops the Redmen one-half game behind Rhody with only one Conference game left--in Orono, Maine next Wednesday. URI has two more Conference games, both at home, against Maine and New Hampshire.

UMass once again displayed a frustratingly consistent inability to win on the road. The hoopsters are now 5-9 on the road as opposed to 9-1 at home.

Skaters In Final Tune-up For Playoffs

By BILL BALLOU

If you've ever watched late night movies starring Jimmy Cagney and Edward G. Robinson, then you know how they always seem to end with the murderer getting a last minute reprieve and ending up living happily ever after.

Well, not making any insinuations, the UMass hockey team is in much the same situation as those movies.

The Redmen have been playing rather poorly as of late, and with the first game of the playoffs coming up Saturday featuring a team that beat the Redmen in their only previous encounter by 5-4, it is imperative that Coach Jack Canniff's skaters "get on the stick."

This is where the aforementioned reprieve comes in. The Redmen have one game coming up before playoff action starts and it's tonight versus the Division 1 Providence Friars. The Friars are currently battling for one of the two remaining playoff berths in their Division and are at the top of their game, with a recent 6-2 win over powerful New Hampshire evidence of this.

So, if the Redmen have any more bad hockey in their collective systems, they have one more chance to rid themselves of it before it becomes too late.

"Too late" means that there is no way the UMass playoff seed can be changed in any direction save upward, but, the playoff system is a single elimination setup and one loss means that title hopes are kaput for at least another year.

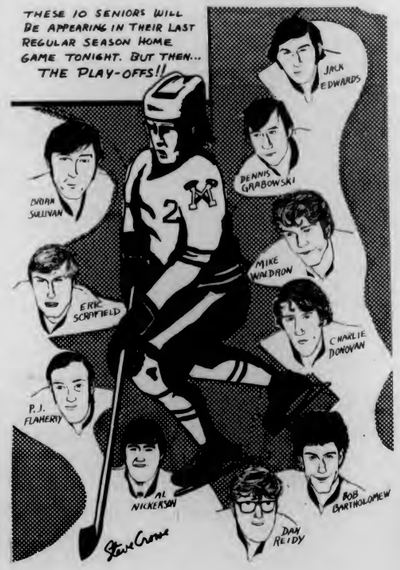
The UMass' opponent for the postseason opener is St. Anselm's, and against the Saints the Redmen came up with their worst performance in recent history.

However, that performance notwithstanding, this is looking to be a true "grudge" match for both teams.

UMass, of course, still has that memory from the Manchester fiasco where not only did they lose on the scoreboard, but to add insult to injury were treated like bumpkins from the sticks who wouldn't know the difference between a locker room and an outhouse. Add to this the fact that there were a couple of shoving matches during the game and that several of the St. Anselm's players were ticketed for UMass and couldn't get in and you have all the makings of a rip-snorter.

One thing that should be in favor of UMass is that St. Anselm's is a team composed of just freshmen and sophomores while the Redmen are considerably more experienced. UMass also has previous playoff experience while St. Anselm's has none, and experience is a major factor in playoff hockey.

But this is all in the future and it can't erase the fact that the Redmen aren't playing well. Their main problem has been the inability to put the puck in the net, and after all, that's the name of the game.



This problem is accented by the inexplicable dip in the scoring of all-time point leader Pat Keenan, who just a couple of weeks ago tied his own record for goals in a season with 28. That was six games ago and as of tonight the Junior center still has 28. He has been picking up assists and the fine play of left winger Dan Reidy has served to take up some of the slack, but the UMass attack still keys around the scoring of Keenan.

Also presenting a problem and a surprise is the practically nil output produced by second line wingers Chico Shea and Eric Scrafield. Between them they have accounted for just 14 goals on the season, and just haven't been able to find the net in recent weeks.

Shea, a junior, has had incredible luck around the net, hitting more posts than a nervous driver in a snowstorm. Scrafield, a notorious late starter, just never got started in time and the extent of his goal scoring in recent games is an open net goal against Hamilton.

Mike Waldron's hat trick versus Boston State, the brilliant goaltending of P.J. Flaherty against Hamilton, and the continued emergence of sophomore center Jim Coleman as a dangerous man around the net have been the chief rays of hope in an otherwise lacklustre stretch for the Redmen.

Providence has good goaltending, great potential, and a reason to play their best hockey. UMass has had trouble beating Division I teams this season and will face a tough time of it tonight. Playoff hockey is not a one man game and individual heroics won't be enough. UMass had better get going as a team tonight or chances are their season will have a premature finish.

Ms. Proell Favored In World Cup Skiing

SOUTH LAKE TAHOE, Calif. (AP) — Annemarie Proell of Austria has everything but an Olympic gold medal to prove she's the world's best woman Alpine skier.

The 18-year-old Austrian is expected to clinch her second straight World Cup season championship Wednesday on the slopes of the Heavenly Valley ski resort. She has 233 points in the standings and needs just one more to formally be crowned champion.

The women's giant slalom, with one run only, Wednesday morning will open the four days of racing here.

Barbara Cochran of Richmond, Vt., stamped herself as an Olympic gold medal threat a year ago by sweeping the women's events-a slalom and giant slalom-at Heavenly Valley.

At the recent Winter Olympics in Japan, Miss Cochran won the slalom and Marie Therese Nadig of Switzerland upset Miss Proell in the giant slalom and downhill events.

Miss Nadig is fourth in the current World Cup Standings, with 89 points, and Miss Cochran is 10th.

Francoise Macchi of France is second with 187 points but is out for the season because of a leg injury suffered before the Olmpics.

It is unlikely the men's World Cup championship will be settled here. Jean-Noel Augert of France has only a 114-100 lead on second place Bernhard Russi of Switzerland, and Henri Duvillard of France is third with 97.

Last year's champion, Gustave Thoeni of Italy, is sixth with 82 points. He won both men's events here on last year's tour.

The ladies' slalom is scheduled Friday and the men's slalom Saturday. Then the skiers travel to Europe for the final three World Cup stops of the season.

Hammerin' Hank Signs

ATLANTA (AP) — Hammerin' Hank Aaron, estimating "it will probably take three years" to equal Babe Ruth's career record home run aggregate, signed a three-year contract Tuesday with the Atlanta Braves, speculation placed the figure at a major league high of $200,000 annually.

"My contract does represent a lot of money," said the 38-year-old Aaron. "But I feel like I've been compared with other players as equal or better than they are, only the salaries didn't match up.

"Now I'm on an equal basis there, too."

The slugging outfielder heads into his 19th spring training camp with 639 homers behind him, 47 of them last year. Seventy-five more will tie him with Ruth's 714 career homers.

Aaron agreed that the nervous pressure would increase as he narrowed the home run gap. But the main thing, he said, "is staying healthy for the next three years."

The day-to-day grind of playing right field will undoubtedly get tougher, Aaron conceded, and he said Manager Luman Harris may want to play him at first base for occasional rests.

Senate May Fund SOS

By MARY SMITH

A bill requiring the Student Senate to transfer the funds in the controversial Spring Concert account to the Students Offering Support was presented at last night's Student Senate meeting. Co-sponsored by Senators Doran, and Hamel, Vice-President Ladd and Senate President Sandwen, the bill would involve the transfer of a total of $8,112.00 previously appropriated to the Concert Committee.

The bill came as the result of a petition circulated on Campus Wednesday afternoon. Demanding the transfer of funds in order to aid the twenty-eight parents of the Belchertown State School who have filed a class action suit against the State Department of Mental Health, the petition was signed by 1,640 people within three hours.

Debate on the bill concerned the legality of spending student tax money on an off-campus project. Vice- President John Hogan claimed that a state law prohibited the spending of student money on a project not directly affecting the UMass campus. President Sandwen refuted Hogan's claim, stating that the ruling was actually an Administrative decision. The bill was committed to the Finance Committee for consideration and will be debated next week.

In other major business, the Senate voted to establish a committee to investigate ways of effectively dealing with the drug situation on campus. The committee, to be appointed by the Senate President, will consist of four students, two administrators/faculty members, and two members of health services. The committee is specifically charged with investigating the feasibility of establishing a halfway house for members of the University community who desire long-term counselling or health services.

Opposition to the bill was based on the argument that the necessary counseling and health services are already available to students. Larry Ladd, a co-sponsor of the bill, refuted those claims, stating that the present services are "crisis oriented", and offer no provisions for those who require a more permanent type of service. Senator John Stevens also spoke in favor of the bill. Stevens stressed the fact that the service would be open to anyone who felt that they needed or wanted such help. The house would enable students to receive help without leaving the University. Lee Sandwen reminded the Senate that, at present, only a committee was being established, and the bill was passed.

Three other major committees were dealt with in the course of the meeting. The first bill creates a nine-person Advisory Committee on Teacher Evaluation to be composed of students, faculty members and one graduate student. The main purpose of the committee will be to assist the Provost's Office in the planning and administering of the teacher evaluation questionnaires.

The second bill provides for the establishment of an Ad-Hoc Committee on the Student Activities Staff. The committee, to be named by the Senate President, will determine the official University policy for the staff, what functions the staff performs,

Quinn - "Students Are Apethetic..."

By NEIL GIROUX
Special to the Collegian

Boston--Atty. Gen. Robert H. Quinn said Wednesday night that "students at the University of Massachusetts are, by and large, apathetic and unconcerned" about the future of Massachusetts state government.

Quinn, at a fund-raiser for Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, (D—Maine), said that a "wide variety of factors contribute to student apathy at the state school."

"Students are unsure about the future of state government, but they are also unsure about themselves," Quinn said in an interview.

"Many students today are quite cynical about government, and this causes them to sit on their hands and be cynical about government leaders," Quinn said.

"State leaders must insure students that the proper priorities are being followed toward solving serious social problems," he said.

Asked what he considers to be last year's most important step in including students in participation in state affairs, the Attorney General said that his ruling that "students on campuses should be allowed to vote in all elections at the campus," had the most far-reaching effect.

Quinn ruled that the recent U.S. constitutional amendment which allowed 18-year-olds to vote meant that students should be allowed to vote at their school locations, if they wish.

"It is most important that students who have keen insight into the serious problems affecting our society, should have an equal force with all others in determining the directions of their government," Quinn said.

"But students seem unsure and sometimes too cynical in regarding their state government," he said.

"With the extreme amount of taxes which state government consumes, and with the important areas such as housing, consumer protection, and racial harmony, with which state government deals, students have a far greater stake to uphold," Quinn said.

Atty. Gen. Robert H. Quinn, from all indications, is presently leading the Democratic party for the 1974 gubernatorial nomination.

Quinn, a former Speaker of the House, was elected Attorney General in 1970 by a near-record plurality, after spending two years replacing former Atty. Gen. Elliott L. Richardson, who resigned to join the Nixon administration as Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Others mentioned for the top Democratic spot are House Speaker David M. Bartley (D-Holyoke), and U.S. Rep. Michael Harrington (D-Mass.), a former state representative from Salem.

The Republican opponent for Quinn or one of the others is expected to be incumbent Gov. Francis W. Sargent or Lt. Gov. Donald R. Dwight.

Some senators appeared bored, and were observed knitting in the back of the meeting room. Not so with this eager senator, though. (MDC Photo by Carl Nash)

Move To New Library Planned

By DOUGLAS PATCH

Final plans are being made for moving into the new library in July of this year. With the deadline for ordering furniture, carpeting, and other new fixtures set at March 15, the Director of the library, Mr. Boylan, is presently working on preparing the final list.

The new tower library, designed by Edward Stone, who also designed the Kennedy Center in Washington, is the third most expensive library built in the country since 1960, at a cost of $16.8 million. There are presently in the country three libraries larger in gross square feet than ours: at the University of Chicago, N.Y.U. and Indiana University. According to Mr. Boylan, the tower format is the form that most new libraries will take over the next decade. With limited space becoming a key problem in construction, the tower is one of the most economical building formats.

At first, the new library will house a total of 1,150,000 volumes, to be increased eventually to 2.5 million. It will be the only library to have the layered effect of two floors of stacks followed by one study floor. The collections will be arranged according to departments as much as space allows. Five high speed elevators will service the twenty-six floors available to public use.

The new library will alleviate what Mr. Boylan calls "an impossible situation" in Goodell Library. Although it should house only 500,000 volumes with a staff of sixty, Goodell presently contains 800,000 volumes with a staff of two-hundred. This situation has come about as a result of an astonishing increase from 200,000 volumes, the amount which the library housed six years ago.

Mr. Boylan said that since the state legislature allots a sustaining fund of only $200,000 per year when it should be close to a million, the library can not meet the standard of 2.8 million volumes set for a university of this size by the O.E.A.

Although it is difficult to project ahead on a campus developing at so fast a rate as ours, Mr. Boylan said that he hopes that the new building can offer the service that a campus of this size deserves. In his opinion, the important thing is to be able to admit that something does not work, and to strive toward changing it. He hopes that this policy will be followed in future complications that may arise.

The new library is now being fitted for its proposed July opening. Beautiful, isn't it? For its cost of 16.8 million it had better be...but what about that crane? (MDC Photo by Al Chapman)

Police Study Group Sets Its Directions

By MDC STAFF

After much disagreement as to procedure and coverage, Amherst's Law Enforcement Study Committee decided what directions it should take last night at their third meeting in the Town Hall.

The committee had been formed to generate input ideas for a report to be developed on the Amherst Police Department by John C.H. Horder, a civil management consultant.

At their next meeting, each member of the committee will present a short statement on selected topics. The committee will then "digest" what has been said and vote its acceptance or rejection of each recommendation at the fifth meeting.

The topics include recruitment, training and educating policemen; arrest procedures and due process by policement; the composition of members and their relations to the community, civilian controls and reviews, and where the department should be going.

The decision came after arguments started by Eric Walgren, from the Bill of Rights Committee at UMass, as to the composition of the committee and whether or not to hear testimony from people who have received police abuse.

Answering criticism of Walgren's complaints of a "lackey, establishment" group, Demaradzki stated that individuals on the committee are from all walks of life and reassured the group that his mind was open to all suggestions.

Walgren had suggested the removal of all police officers from the committee. Demaradzki is an auxiliary officer.

Ute Indian Speaks To History Class

By MARK VOGLER

An American History class made its week complete last Thursday evening when it invited a full-blooded American Indian to speak in regard to his tribe's past history and his purpose for pursuing an education here at the university.

The meeting took place in Herter Hall with about 50 in attendance and was arranged by lecturer Stu Davis and discussion leader Marty Pasternack.

Charles Redfoot, 36, and a prominent member of the Ute Indian tribe of White Rocks, Utah, is presently enrolled in hotel and restaurant management courses. He has been on campus since last semester and hopes to resume his position as assistant hotel manager to the Bottle Hollow Resort after completing his training period next January. His secretary, Francis Poowegup, is also a Ute Indian studying at UMass.

Bottle Hollow is nicknamed after an area upon which the cavalry disposed of empty bottles after consuming alcoholic beverages. The resort opened up seven months ago and has since become the biggest enterprise that the tribe of 1600 has engaged in.

Redfoot told the students that the Ute tribe had lived in Denver, Colorado before the cavalry came and drove them off, but throughout the years nobody knew for sure their exact origin.

"My ancestors knew how to live in the wilderness," Redfoot proudly stated. "In the winter months they used to migrate. My people would go wherever the game would go. They would follow the big game animals such as deer, elk, and buffalo. If it wasn't for them, they wouldn't have survived, since the utilized these animals for food, clothing, and shelter."

Redfoot budgeted a great deal of his time to a question and answer period which enabled room for many and varied topics.

When asked what political figure had aided the Indian cause the most, the guest speaker replied: "Robert Kennedy. He was one of the main ones who was helping us out. He was the one who had helped open our voting rights and got part of the land and oil back that was taken away from us."

The Ute Indian did not seem to be bitter with regard to what the white man had done to the Indian civilization in the past. He seemed unmoved by questions probing for his personal animosity towards white people and he suggested that he had none whatsoever.

"The only time that I have a dislike for a white person is when I fight with one," kidded Redfoot. "But myself and many of my people don't hold any grudge against the white man and what happened a while ago. We don't dwell on the past. We think of the future instead."

But as far as the Indian culture being lost forever due to the possibilities of integration within the American civilization, he remained steadfast. "No matter what they do, I don't think that they could ever take our culture away from us. And if it ever happens, we'll fight it all the way."

What does Redfoot see as his ultimate goal of the entire Indian race and his tribe in general? Here's how he elaborated: "I hope that all Indians get what they want in this world and what they're striving for. A lot of different tribes have different problems to solve. The main concern for my own people is education. We want our younger generation to go out and attend colleges. That's the most important concern of our council members."

and make recommendations concerning the staff to the Senate, after holding at least one public hearing.

The third bill charges the Rent and Fees Committee with compiling a cost analysis of the student occupied space in the Campus Center and the Student Union. The purpose of the bill was to provide students with an awareness of the costs incurred by the Campus Center and Student Union. It was originally desired that the report would be available before the Campus Center/Student Union fees are increased by the Administration, but it was decided that such a deadline was impossible for the committee to meet.

Also passed at last night's meeting was a bill to rewrite the Student Code of Conduct. The Code has not been fully revised since 1966.

In a special Business Motion the Senate voted to endorse Women's International Day, Wednesday, March 8. Sponsored by various women's groups on campus and in the surrounding communities, the day will be aimed at uniting all women. Activities scheduled at UMass include a march to begin at 11 a.m. and a program of speakers appearing in the Student Union Ballroom from 12 to 3 p.m.

S.O.S. Petitions Support

By BOB CALLAHAN

A three hour drive to collect signatures showing student support towards the transfer of funds from the Concert Committee to S.O.S. (Students Offering Support) netted over 1,600 signatures yesterday.

A commentary and letter proposing the idea of transferring the funds to S.O.S. appeared in yesterday's Collegian. Shortly after the appearance of the article a drive was organized by the S.O.S. committee to seek student support on the proposal. Volunteers canvassed dormitories, classroom buildings and the Campus Center-Student Union complex in search of student support.

As of 7:00 last evening, S.O.S. Chairman Joe Sylvia reported that in three hours 1,640 signatures had been received supporting the idea of transferring the funds.

In a meeting held yesterday afternoon between several members of the Student Senate and organizers of S.O.S., it was decided to present a motion to the Student Senate at their Wednesday night meeting asking that the funds be transferred. The motion was presented to the Senate by Student Senate President Lee Sandwen, Vice President Larry Ladd and Senators Paul Doran and Paul Hamel.

Bob Medeiros, Collegian reporter, said in an MDC interview last evening that an important meeting of all S.O.S. members will be held next Monday evening. According to Medeiros the meeting will be held to discuss future strategy.

Speaking about the proposal, spokesman Medeiros said "We realize that in order to expect the Governor and the Legislature to change their priorities that we as students must change our priorities. We would be hypocrites if we demanded the Governor and the Legislature to give us more money for the kids at Belchertown when we spend $12,000 on a five hour fiasco which includes almost $1,700 for security to direct traffic during the concert."

"In order to make S.O.S. work it is obvious that we need the full backing of all students who are willing to bring justice to Belchertown. It should be clear to all students that the only thing that talks in Massachusetts is unfortunately money," Medeiros continued.

In making his plea for student involvement, Medeiros asks that interested students contact him today and tomorrow at the Collegian Office.

Work Study Students Continue On Security

By MARK VOGLER

Despite recent moves by area directors to restrict security receptionist positions to dormitory residents on State 03 funds, it appears very likely that work study students will continue to be employed in the coming academic year.

According to Whitmore sources, dormitory security requests of State 03 funds should approach about $200,000 which would relieve all those hired on work study. But an expected cutback on the funds makes the possibility improbable now. This year $90,000 was allocated to dorm employed receptionists while the work study payroll constituted another $50,000.

Dan Fitzpatrick, Associate Dean of Students pinpointed difficulties encountered in the past as major reasons for the efforts to coordinate security with the dorms.

As Fitzpatrick put it: "People have often condemned work study people as bad for security, but this is certainly not born out from the results. A majority of the students have been effective, yet there seems to be a better supervisor relationship between heads of residence and receptionists working on 03 funds.

"In some cases though," he continued "some students on work study just didn't pan out. They were just mismatched for the job. I think that's where we had our problem. Some of the receptionists didn't even live in the dorm in which they were assigned, and a few of this type felt little responsibility to the head of residence. Since the student was on work study, the task was difficult to remove him if he performed below expectations."

"The chances of the dorms coordinating their own security is possible, stated Fitzpatrick. "but improbable. It isn't going to become a reality, it can't. The state isn't going to give us the excess funds. If the 03 funds are reduced, then we may have to rely more heavily on work study receptionists in the future."

Quinn And Issues

By ROBERT MEDEIROS

U.S. District Court Judge Francis J. W. Ford issued an injunction ordering the state to begin major reforms at the Belchertown State School for the retarded on Feb. 11. Judge Ford in issuing the injunction gave the state 30 days to comply to his orders.

Twenty-three days have now gone by since the Judge's decision and to the surprise of no one, the state has refused to act on the injunction. At 11:30 this morning the state represented by Atty. Gen. Robert H. Quinn's Office--will request a modification of the injunction. The changes, if granted, would definitely "gut most of the provisions."

It has also been reported that the state is prepared to appeal the entire case to the U.S. Court of Appeals with the intention of having the case thrown out of federal court. In fact, the official decision may be released in Boston today. Any appeal of this type will directly involve Quinn who has, on the most part, stayed in the background. The fact remains that Quinn is now in an excellent position to control the direction of the appeal.

The Attorney General on the other hand, is scheduled tonight in the Student Union Ballroom to tackle the problem of consumer protection. Politicians in Massachusetts have few subjects which they are willing to discuss in public--consumer protection just happens to be one of the subjects. Another similar subject is environment--the subject Gov. Sargent plans to discuss next Tuesday on campus. Quinn has said that UMass students are "unconcerned about the future of Massachusetts state government." It will be interesting to see if the Attorney General exposes himself as a hypocrite tonight by dodging the issue which is of the upmost concern to UMass students: the Belchertown class action suit.

Quinn finds it difficult to understand why students are "cynical about government leaders." Maybe he can explain why Gov. Sargent recommended that the University's requested budget be cut by 20 per cent and the requested Belchertown budget be cut by almost 40 per cent. The main question is what would the Attorney General have done in Sargent's position.

Hopefully, Quinn will address himself not only to the inhumane conditions at the Belchertown School, but also to what he intends to do in the future concerning his role as Attorney General in relation to the Belchertown suit.

It should be interesting to see if Quinn will be coming on as a Massachusetts politician who is running for governor, or a Massachusetts politician who is willing to face the issues which are most "relevant" to the majority of UMass students.

VISTA Looks For Workers

By BARRY STAVRO

Fred Druck, one of the representatives of the Peace Corps and VISTA programs who have been recruiting students here this week said, "We are more interested in applicants with work experience than college degrees."

In an MDC interview Druck said the question is "What have you done with your life outside of academia?"

He mentioned that the Peace Corps is currently involved in agricultural recruiting, as the population rate has forced many countries to look towards modern agricultural methods to survive. Many retired farmers have joined the program.

Druck himself served in Micronesia, a small South Pacific island in which the populus had to change from hunters to growers of food because of the high population. Druck said, "80% of the world is playing catch-up agriculture." The modern methods have been developed, he said, but they need to be transferred by mouth to the isolated farmers.

When asked what type of people volunteer for VISTA and the Peace Corps, Druck replied, "There are as many reasons as volunteers. You are the Peace Corps or VISTA. You're an individual and you don't represent U.S. policy overseas."

Currently, over a hundred applications have been received here at UMass. Twenty is generally the minimum age limit.

Druck was asked what the programs have accomplished. He said it was hard to say in concrete terms, as in foreign countries, most of the population does not read or write. Therefore the volunteers "Are depositing information and these people aren't going to forget it." They will transfer it by word of mouth over future generations.

Also foreign countries have their own cultures that are sensitive to imposed and sudden changes. Progress therefore will be slow. Druck said, "Sometimes you have to use reverse psychology" with the people.

VISTA's accomplishments and its purposes are best summed up by what the letters stand for: Volunteers in Service to America.

The Peace Corps was initiated in 1961. Since then, the volunteers have risen from 800 to 9000. Presently some 60 foreign countries are served.

VISTA has 4600 volunteers serving in 49 states, Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands. They serve for one year.

Druck mentioned that this years budget of 75 million dollars is not as high in past years, but he did not feel that the programs would be phased out. He said that "Foreign Aid is being completely reorganized anyway. Before there were so many beaurocrats (instead of workers) that you couldn't do anything."

VISTA and the Peace Corps will continue to recruit applicants through this afternoon.

Larry To Perform At Pierpont

Plans were finalized Wednesday night at the Project 10 community meeting for a Little Latin Larry concert Saturday, April 22.

Jim Gilbert, community Head-of-Residence, said, "Given the lack of University support, the Project has realized that it must generate its own resources to implement its own academic community."

Kleindienst Will Answer Charges

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate Judiciary Committee will take sworn testimony Thursday from Deputy Atty. Gen. Richard G. Kleindienst and others on allegations that the Justice Department dropped an antitrust case after the defendant pledged funds to help finance the Republican National Convention.

Specifically, the panel will examine reports by columnist Jack Anderson that the antitrust action against International Telephone & Telegraph Co., was dropped after an ITT subsidiary pledged $400,000 for the GOP convention next August in San Diego, Calif.

Kleindienst, whose nomination to succeed Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell already has been unanimously approved by the committee, requested the unusual hearing, Chairman James O. Eastland, D-Miss., told a reporter Wednesday.

Other witnesses, Eastland said, will be Anderson, Richard W. McLaren, former head of the Justice Department's Antitrust Division and now a federal judge in Illinois, and a representative of ITT, a giant conglomerate.

Kleindienst met Tuesday night in the office of Republican leader Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania, a Judiciary Committee member, with Eastland and Sen. Roman L. Hruska, R-Neb., the ranking minority member of the committee.

Hruska told a reporter that Kleindienst gave them "a very complete and satisfactory answer" to the allegations. Similar statements were made by Scott and Eastland, who said they see no threat to Senate confirmation of Kleindiest's nomination.

The committee reported the nomination to the Senate late Tuesday. Eastland explained the Thursday session does not constitute a reopening of the nomination hearing because that could be done only if the committee recalled its favorable report from the Senate.

He said that after taking the testimony about the settlement of the antitrust cases against ITT, the committee will decide what to do.

Mitchell, whose resignation to direct President Nixon's re-election campaign became effective Wednesday, has denied Anderson's reports. So has ITT.

Anderson, in columns Tuesday and Wednesday, sought to link settlement of the antitrust cases to a pledge by the Sheraton Corp. of America, an ITT subsidiary, to help finance the convention. And he pictured both Mitchell and Kleindienst as taking part in the negotiations.

An out-of-court settlement was announced by the Justice Department last July 31. It permitted ITT to keeppart of three firms it sought to acquire by merger, principally the Hartford Fire Insurance Co., if it would divest itself of certain other holdings.

Kleindienst met Wednesday with three Democratic liberals on the Judiciary Committee, Sens. Birch Bayh of Indiana, Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and John V. Tunney, California.

In a statement after the meeting, Kennedy said Kleindienst "agreed with us that the public interest would be best served it tomorrow's hearing is as thorough and complete as possible...

"He assured us that he does not want to assume the position of attorney general under a cloud, and that he understands our obligations require us to call all the relevant witnesses and to acquire all the relevant materials."

In Brief...

Sec. Connally Warns Congress on Selling Gold

WASHINGTON (AP) — Treasury Secretary John B. Connally urged Congress Wednesday to resist, at least for now, the temptation to allow Americans to buy and sell gold.

Amending a dollar-devaluation bill to permit U.S. citizens to own gold bullion for the first time since 1934 would be misunderstood overseas in nervous financial markets, Connally said.

"There are other things the people of the United States can gamble on," he told the House Banking and Currency Committee. "They don't have to have gold to gamble on."

Mujibur Rahman Talks Economics in Russia

MOSCOW (AP) — Prime Minister Mujibur Rahman of Bangladesh met for three hours Wednesday with Premier Alexei N. Kosygin and Soviet economic experts, apparently outlining the need for Soviet aid to his young nation.

The meeting began in the Kremlin a few hours after Mujibar arrived in Moscow.

Tass news agency said the talks covered questions of cooperation and "topical international problems of mutual interest." It reported the atmosphere was warm and friendly.

No details of the first session were reported, but there was little doubt that the economic woes of Bangladesh were high on the agenda.

New President of Uraguay Vows War on Leftists

MONTEVIDEO, Uruguay (AP) — Juan M. Bordaberry, a rancher-politician who has vowed unyielding war against leftist guerrillas, became Uruguay's 55th president Wednesday in subdued ceremonies with none of the pageantry of the past.

He took over for a five-year term from President Jorge Pacheco Areco, a fellow Colorado party member.

Police and military patrols were out in force to guard against terrorists.

The Tupamaro guerrillas, Uruguay's oldest and most active left-wing band, even surprised authorities by freeing one of four prisoners Tuesday night.

Court Broadens FTC Powers

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court Wednesday broadened the Federal Trade Commission's power to move against unfair or deceptive merchandising practices.

In a 7-0 decision, the court said the regulatory agency's authority is not limited to providing protection against antitrust violations.

Justice Byron R. White said the FTC may go beyond the letter or even the spirit of antitrust laws and combat an apparently limitless array of immoral or unfair trade schemes.

The expansion of FTC's field of action could make the agency a more potent watchdog for the American consumer.

There was no immediate reaction from FTC officials, who said they wanted to read White's opinion before expressing a judgment.

The court acted in a case concerning the Sperry & Hutchinson Co., the largest and oldest trading-stamp firm. The FTC charged antitrust violations in the S&H restricted redemption and exchange of the trading stamps, some one trillion of which have been passing them on as bonuses to consumers since 1896.

A cease-and-desist order entered by the FTC in 1968 was reversed in 1970 by the U.S. Circuit Court in New Orleans in a 2-1 decision that found no antitrust violation by S&H. Since the FTC did not challenge this point the Supreme Court upheld the ruling in favor of the trading-stamp manufacturer.

However, the FTC won a bigger point when the high court agreed with its argument that its action against a merchandiser need not be pegged to the antitrust laws.

The S&H case was sent back to the FTC for further proceedings.

In a second ruling, the court barred the states from suing for damages to its citizens under federal antitrust laws.

Beirut, Lebanon–People hold mass funeral for several Palestinian guerrillas who were killed by Israeli troops. In Syria, jets bombed Israeli territory in retaliation.

Israel Bombs Syrian Guerrillas Syria Bombs Israeli Position

(AP) — Syrian jets bombed Israeli positions in the occupied Golan Heights Wednesday in retaliation for new Israeli air and artillery strikes on guerrilla hideouts in Arab territory.

Syria claimed its MIG17s inflicted heavy damage on the heights, seized by Israel in the 1967 Middle East war.

Israel said the attack caused neither casualties nor damage. It said the attack by the Soviet-made jets was the first Syrian air incursion against Israel since last September.

Damascus radio said the air strikes were in reprisal for Israeli air and artillery attacks earlier in the day against guerrilla bases in three villages in southern Syria.

Syria said three guerrillas and a civilian were killed in the attacks on guerrilla havens about 60 miles south of Damasucs, Syria's capital.

The Israeli military command said all its planes returned safely despite Arab claims of heavy anti-aircraft fire.

Israel said it pounded seven guerrilla bases in the Syrian desert to retaliate for attacks by Syrian-based commandos on the Golan Heights.

The heights are close by the Arkoub region of southeastern Lebanon, where Israel has flushed out Palestinian commandos in its biggest anti-guerrilla action since the 1967 war. The four-day Lebanese operation ended Monday but guerrillas claimed Israeli planes attacked two villages inside Lebanon Wednesday. There were no reports of casualties.

The military command in Tel Aviv said Syrian planes penetrated three miles into Israeli-held airspace in the attack on the southern end of the Golan Heights.

The command said the MIG 17s-the type of plane used by the Communists in the Korean War-flew low, dropped their bombs, then sped back across the cease-fire line.

Israeli planes tired to intercept the MIGs and anti-aircraft guns opened fire but there was no contact, the command said.

The targets of the Syrian attack were "nahals," settlements inhabited by voluntary army recruits working the land as part of their military service.

Earlier in the day, Israel sent waves of fighter-bombers into Syria for the first time since Jan. 24.

Bombing, Murders In N. Ireland

BELFAST (AP)-Terrorists marched a Northern Irish militiaman from his home Wednesday and shot him to death, minute after assuring his sobbing wife he would not be harmed.

Militiaman Tommy Fletcher was in his farmhouse only 100 yards from the border with the Irish republic when the terrorists-presumably an assassination squad of the Irish Republican Army-entered an took him away.

Hours later a giant bomb rocked Londonderry, wounding at least 15 persons, including two soldiers, and causing the city center's worst damage in more than two years of violence.

The bomb, estimated at up to 100 pounds of gelignite, exploded in a parked taxi and damaged all 50 shops on Ferryquay Street.

Persons in the area were evacuated after a warning but even hundreds of yards away behind army cordons they were hit by flying glass.

Fletcher, 43, was kissing his wife before leaving for his regular job. He was bustled into a nearby field where three bullets were pumped into his head.

His wife, who heard the shots, said the gunmen had told her Fletcher would not be hurt.

Fletcher, a private in the Ulster Defense Regiment, was the second militiaman to die in less than 12 hours. Two hooded gunmen burst into the Lurgan home of Harry Dixon and shot him dead Tuesday night. His 11-year-old daughter was struck in the leg by a bullet.

The slayings raised Northern Ireland's death toll to 253 in 31 months of sectarian violence.

Both deaths were blamed on the Irish Republican Army-IRA-which is waging a guerrilla campaign to wrest the Protestant-dominated north from British rule and unite it with the overwhelmingly Roman Catholic republic.

In Belfast, the British army said it captured an IRA bombmaker high on its wanted list after raiding a house in the capital's Catholic Andersontown quarter.

An army spokesman said an army squad which raided the area after a tip found the man huddled in an attic.

The spokesman did not name the captive but claimed he was a "provisional" IRA officer who had escaped when troops raided another house in the same area earlier this year. He had been holding a bomb instruction class for seven IRA recruits who were arrested.

Security forces believe Andersontown, where the IRA enjoys powerful support, is a virtual explosives factory for making many of the bombs used in the terrorist assault in Belfast.

N.J. High Court Declares Abortion Law Unconstitutional

TRENTON (AP)-New Jersey's 121-year-old abortion law was declared unconstitutional Tuesday by a panel of three federal judges on the ground it violates a woman's right to privacy in the use of her own body.

The ruling leaves the state powerless to prosecute anyone for abortions under the present law unless it can overturn the ruling on appeal, which must be filed directly with the U.S. Supreme Court.

A spokesman for Atty. Gen. George F. Kugler, Jr., said the state had not received his copy of the decision and therefore had not decided whether to appeal. Nor could Kugler say whether abortions were now legal in the state, the spokesman said.

The ruling, in which one judge dissented, also held that the law was unconstitutionally vague because it does not protect physicians from possible prosecutions for treating their patients or giving them advice.

The majority opinion was written by Judge Philip Foreman and joined in by Judge George H. Barlow. Judge Leonard Garth dissented from major portions of the opinion, including the conclusion.

"We held that a woman has a constitutional right of privacy under the 9th and 14th amendments to determine for herself whether to bear a child or to terminate a pregnancy in its early stages, free from unreasonable interference by the state," Judge Foreman wrote.

Although the majority declined to enjoin the state from enforcing the law, legal sources said that any arrests for violations would undoubtedly result in an injunction.

Judge Garth said he agrees "generally that there is a fundamental right in a married woman to determine whether or not to bear a child, once conception has occurred." But he said that the state "has such a compelling interest in the preservation of life, including fetal life, that even the fundamental right which I have acknowledged must be subordinated to the state interest."

Garth noted that the New Jersey State Supreme Court has ruled that a person does not have a constitutional right to choose to die.

The ruling by the three judges stems from two suits filed in December, 1970, by the New Jersey branch of the American Civil Liberties Union on behalf of a number of plaintiffs.

Curtis Miffed By Spying

AUGUSTA, Maine (AP)-Gov. Kenneth M. Curtis told the Secretary of the Army Wednesday he wants a full explanation of why he was spied on by Army intelligence agents in 1969.

A copywrited story in the New York Times Tuesday said Curtis was among numerous top government officials whose political activities came under Army surveillance from late 967 to 1970.

Curtis said in a telegram to Army Secretary Robert F. Froehlke that his name was on a computerized report circulated in the comestic war room of the Pentagon on Oct. 15, 1969.

"The cryptic language of the report is not clear, nor apparently is the information contained of an accurate nature," he said.

"But this is beside the point. The implication of surveillance of private citizens by a military body without the knowledge of consent of those citizens runs counter to every hallowed tenet of free expression contained in our American heritage."

Ed. Bill Passed; Anti-Busing Riders Rejected

WASHINGTON (AP)-The Senate Wednesday passed a $23-billion higher education-school desegregation bill after rejecting all attempts to add tough antibusing amendments.

The measure was passed on an 88 to 6 roll call vote.

Busing foes made a last-gasp effort to get the stringent Griffin amendment back into the bill but failed on a 49-48 vote.

The amendment, which would forbid the federal courts to issue busing orders in school desegregation cases, was offered by Sen. Robert Dole, F-Kas., the Republican national chairman, just before the passage vote.

It lost when all senators present voted as they did when it was beaten 50-47 Tuesday. The difference was that two opponents of the proposal-Gale McGee, D-Wyo., and Robert T. Stafford, R-Vt.,-were missing this time.

Vice president Spiro T. Agnew came to the Senate to take over the chair he had on the two previous occasions when the proposal of Sen. Robert P. Griffin, R-Mich., was voted on. There was speculation he would have to put the amendment over had there been a tie vote.

After seven days of acrimonious debate, the far-reaching bill was sent to conference with the House which attached three strong riders aimed at busing when it passed the measure last November.

The major section of the bill contains broad new kinds of aid for college students and institutions of higher education.

Colleges and universities suffering financial crises have been pleading for such assistance.

Another major part of the bill would make available $1.5 billion asked by President Nixon to help schools districts facing desegregation problems.

Earlier, the Senate defeated 67 to 26 an amendment offered by Sen. Sam Ervin, D-N.C., to deny federal officials authority to prevent any child from attending the school nearest his home.

McCloskey Calls For More Hearings

(AP) — Republican presidential hopeful Rep. Paul N. McCloskey called for the Senate Judiciary Committee to reopen hearings on the nomination of Richard Kleindienst as attorney general to learn about an alleged $400,000 pledge to help finance the Republican National Convention. (See story page 4.)

The committee will hear Kleindienst under oath Thursday but has said it is not reopening his nomination hearing.

McCloskey, the California Republican who is challenging President Nixon's renomination, told newsmen in Concord, N.H., Wednesday that former Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell should be called along with Kleindienst to "appear before Congress under oath."

Meantime, the Judiciary Committee said in Washington that Deputy Atty. Gen. Kleindienst would testify under oath Thursday as it examines reports by columnist Jack Anderson that the Justice Department dropped antitrust action against International Telephone & Telegraph Co., after an ITT subsidiary pledged $400,000 for the GOP convention next August in San Diego, Calif. (See story above.)

Kleindienst, whose nomination to succeed Mitchell has already been unanimously approved by the committe, requested the unusual hearing, Chairman James O. Eastland, D-Miss., told a newsman Wednesday.

Mitchell and ITT have denied Anderson's allegations.

McCloskey also reported receipt of $129,163 in contributions and $136,310 in expenses for his five-month campaign in the New Hampshire primary and said that Nixon had an obligation to make similar disclosures.

Meantime another administration appointee, presidential aide Henry Kissinger, came under fire from one of the Democratic candidates in the New Hampshire presidential primary, Sen. Vance Hartke.

Hartke said in an interview in Dover that national security adviser Kissinger has assumed powers that are not his and should be fired. He said Kissinger's power "is an example of what's wrong about our government. His power is not his. He is not the secretary of state. He should be fired."

Kissinger has conducted secret diplomatic missions for Nixon to mainland China and the Paris peace talks on Vietnam.

In other political developments Wednesday:

HUMPHREY-Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey, D-Minn., appeared before the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO convention in Pittsburgh.

YORTY-In Milford, N.H., Los Angeles Mayor Sam Yorty, also campaigning for the Democratic nomination, told a service club meeting that he blamed his "left-wing Democratic presidential opponents as well as ecology extremists for killing the SST program and the subsequent loss of 50,000 jobs."

ASHBROOK-Rep. John Ashbrook, R-Ohio, said in Newport, N.H., that with Nixon's trip to China, "the countdown has already started for Taiwan." He said Nixon's statement that it was America's intention eventually to withdraw troops from Taiwan was "a rather poor diplomatic way to handle an ally."

MUSKIE-Sen. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine, frontrunner for the Democratic nomination, was endorsed by 29 New Hampshire state legislators and nine state labor leaders.

GOP To Return Funds To IT&T?

WASHINGTON (AP)-Republicans planning the party's convention this summer say they will not accept a disproportionate share of financial contributions from International Telephone & Telegraph Co. or any other single source.

Chairman Richard L. Herman of the GOP Arrangements Committee planning for the August convention in San Diego said Wednesday the party would not accept "such a disproportionate share of the expenses from one source" as $400,000.

Herman said his committee, which is handling financial arrangements for the convention, will look into cash payments from San Diego groups that are expected to pay $600,000.

Herman's statement to newsmen during a meeting of the Republican National Committee here came during a dispute surrounding the reported pledge of $400,000 to the GOP from ITT.

Columnist Jack Anderson has reported that ITT promised the $400,000 gift to help finance the convention in return for an agreement last summer that the Justice Department go relatively easy on the huge conglomerate in a then pending antitrust case.

ITT has denied ever making such an offer and the Justice Department has denied discussing it.

Last December it was disclosed that the Sheraton Corp. of America, an ITT subsidiary, did give $100,00 to help finance the convention and earmarked another $100,000 for the same cause.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is holding a special hearing Thursday to examine Anderson's allegations.

Herman said Wednesday that none of the Sheraton money has been received by the Republican National Committee.

"If we have knowledge that a disproportionate amount comes to us" from a single source, Herman said, "we won't take it."

Herman said also that only $100,000 of a total cash payment of $600,000 from San Diego-area business groups and San Diego County has been received by the Republican National Committee.

Herman said the original ageement between the Republicans and San Diego civic groups called for a $200,000 payment by last Aug. 1, a second $200,000 payment by Jan. 1 of this year and a third $200,000 payment by April 1.

Other Republican sources privately indicated considerable doubt that the remaining $500,000 in cash will be paid to the national committee.

Herman said he is allowing San Diego groups to partially meet the remaining $500,000 obligation by selling advertisements in the convention program, starting at $10,000 per page.

Al Klein Sues For Libel

A $150-million libel suit has been filed in State Supreme Court against New York Magazine and one of its contributors over an article alleging that part of the proceeds from a benefit record album for Bangladesh was "unaccounted for."

The suit was brought by Allen Klein, president of ABKCO Industries, which manages the affairs of three of the Four Beatles. Two of the singers, George Harrison and Ringo Starr, were involved in the Madison Square Garden concert that was recorded on the album, and Mr. Klein has been responsible for the distribution of the recording, "The Concert for Bangladesh," and management of the revenues from it.

In announcing the suit, Mr. Klein contended that the article—by Peter McCabe in the current New York— was inaccurate in giving the disposition of the proceeds from sales of the record album, which sells for $12.98.

U.S. Planes Hit Viet Cong Attack Bases

SAIGON (AP) — Enemy forces attacked in the central highlands Wednesday and U.S. planes bombed and strafed bases believed used to launch the assaults.

The U.S. Command reported 13 B52 missions, seven of them in areas from one to eight miles of Fire Base 5 northwest of Kontum in the central hihglands, scene of recent clashes.

Two missions were flown against target areas 26 and 36 miles southwest of Da Nang in the north, where fighting broke out this week. The port city and Kontum have been mentioned by senior U.S. officers as possible targets for a North Vietnamese offensive.

A South Vietnamese spokesman in Pleiku reported at least three engagements with Communist command troops in the highlands in the past 24 hours, including several enemy rocket attacks.

In one action near Ben Het on the border, the spokesman said, three enemy soldiers were killed in a clash with a unit of the 47th Infantry Regiment. The South Vietnamese reported no casualties.

To the east in coastal Binh Dinh Province, the South Vietnamese claimed killing four enemy soldiers in a fight seven miles northwest of Phu My while suffering no casualties.

The U.S. Command reported that American forces were reduced by 4,900 men Wednesday, dropping the number of U.S. servicemen in Vietnam to fewer than 120,000 in the second largest troop cut of the war. American troop strength reached a peak of 543,000 men in April, 1969.

Great Decisions

U.S., China Policy Discussed

By ETHEL HARRIS

"Our China Policy: How Far and How Deep the Thaw?" was the topic of the fifth panel discussion in the 1972 Great Decisions series. About thirty persons attended the discussion last night in Webster House lounge. The program was taped by WFCR and will be broadcast at a later date.

Moderator of the discussion was Luther Allen of the UMass political science department. Panelists included Franklin Houn of the UMass department of political science; Barry Keenan of the history department of Mt. Holyoke College; and Ray Moore of the history department at Amherst College.

Professor Keenan spoke on developments leading to the "thaw" in Sino-American relations. In 1968, when President Nixon had won the elections, China offered to initiate discussions on "peaceful coexistence". The Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia and buildup of Russian troops on the Chinese border may have been the reason for this timing, according to Keenan.

In 1969, Nixon first permitted the purchase of Chinese goods and quietly withdraw the Seventh Fleet from the Straits of Taiwan. At the same time, the U.S. agreed to renew talks with China. The invasion of Cambodia in 1970 led to Chinese cancellation of these talks, but later in the year the late American journalist Edgar Snow was received favorably in China. The State Department also lifted its travel restrictions at this time.

In 1971, Chinese-American relations improved quickly with the visit of the American ping-pong team to China, the secret trip of presidential advisor Henry Kissinger, the lifting of the trade embargo on Chinese goods, and the announcement of President Nixon's trip to the People's Republic.

Professor Houn attempted to explain why the reapproachment between China and the United States had taken place. He cited the growing power of Soviet Russia, trade competition and the "unspoken fear" on the part of American government officials of Japan's growing power, and the "futility and irrelevance" of the containment policy which the U.S. had pursued for twenty years. Houn also mentioned the changing relations between China and the Soviet Union, and the American desire to "open up" China gradually.

Houn emphasized the new perceptions of the Chinese people which Americans were receiving, and discussed specific points of the joint communique issued three days ago. In particular, he mentioned the U.S. position on relations between the People's Republic and Taiwan, and expressed the feeling that secret peace plans on Indochina may be in the making, and might be announced when President Nixon visits Moscow.

Professor Moore began by stating that the United States toward China was "historically mistaken", and that Americans have applied the European "containment policy" to Asia, a course which is not presently justifiable. Moore mainly concerned himself with U.S. relations with Japan. He claimed that economically little would change, but that we have created a "crisis of confidence" by not consulting with Japan about the Peking mission.

Claiming that most Japanese were presently not happy with the current security treaty, Moore nevertheless stated that the U.S. should not take the initiative in ending the treaty. If the treaty were ended, the Japanese might respond by building up their military strength, especially the Navy; the Chinese might react harshly to this buildup, according to Moore.

Moore saw the role of the U.S. as one of allaying Chinese fear of Japan. The United States should also try to get the Chinese government to learn more about modern Japan, he said.

Questions from the audience included something on the problems of American forces on Taiwan and when they would be removed, as well as our future relations with the People's Republic, and the President's visit as representing the end of the "Cold War" era.

The next Great Decisions discussion will be held on Wednesday, March 8, in Webster House lounge on the topic of "Poor Nations and Rich Nations: Can the Gap Be Narrowed?"

Mass Joins Against Offshore Drilling

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — New York and Connecticut took on two partners-Rhode Island and Massachusetts-Wednesday in their fight against offshore drilling along their coastline.

The loose alliance of the four states was announced after a meeting of the Bistate Legislative Committee on Coastal Marine Resources.

New York Assemblyman Peter Costigan of Setauket and Connecticut State Rep. Francis Ciampi of Waterbury were named cochairmen of the bistate committee.

Costigan said that although the bistate group is concerned with all facets of protecting the shoreline environment, it had decided to concentrate first on the threat posed by possible offshore drilling for oil and gas.

Administrator Reacts To Senate Takeover Of SES

AMHERST — Acting UMass Amherst Chancellor Randolph Bromery this morning reacted calmly to the news that the Student Senate had taken over the operation of a note taking service here.

Bromery said, however, that legal counsel would be sought before a university-wide posture is taken on the matter.

Over the weekend, the UMass Student Senate purchased $5,300 worth of note taking equipment from a former UMass student who has run the service here for the past several years.

The purchase comes close on the heels of the formation last week of a company which plans to sell term papers in the area. Representatives of the area's five colleges have expressed strong opposition to the term paper company.

In reference to the note taking service, Bromery said that "As long as the student learns the information, it would be alright with me."

"At least it keeps the money on the campus," he laughed.

Dr. Robert Gage, acting vice-chancellor for student affairs, said that he was "rather in favor" of the Student Senate taking over the note taking service. He explained that he would be "relatively uneasy", however, if someone outside the university ran the service.

With the Student Senate running the service, according to Gage, the money returns to the senate and the university.

"I just don't think it's a big issue," Gage continued. He said he did not think it made any difference whether a student received lecture information "live" or "canned."

Gage did state his opposition to the term paper service which he described as "deceitful, misleading, and not appropriate."

"The senate wanted to take over the service because lately the other people hadn't been producing a good product and we wanted it done our way," said President Lee Sandwen, who defended the purchase.

"This is not for students who want to cut all their classes. Many students are poor note takers. It is better for them to listen to the lecture, then go to the notes later. They can learn more that way. The faculty have actually helped with this service for the past few years."

Most of the notes are written from cassette tapes recorded during the lecture.

This official sanction for what might still be considered, in some quarters, as cheating, is in contrast to administrative reaction to the introduction to the five-college area last month of Termpapers of Amherst, a service run by Frank Baglione of Amherst, a UMass graduate student in history.

Linked to similar term paper sales operations in the Boston area, the Amherst service offers term papers on specified subjects at the rate of $2 per page and up.

Student authors are paid about $1 less per page to produce the manuscripts.

"This is clearly in violation of the whole intent and spirit of our educational program," was Dean Richard Lyon's reaction at Hampshire College, Amherst.

"A violation of our intellectual ethics," said Dean Robert Ward at Amherst College.

"This is certainly something that no academic institution could look upon favorably," said Smith College Dean Margaret Waggoner.

Atty. Gen. Robert H. Quinn's office is investigating all such term paper services in the state.

Dear Whitmore:

As a student of the University of Massachusetts, already heavily burdened with exorbitant rates, on services which do not seem to give me my "money's worth", and threatened with a tuition increase, I may not be able to pay an increase in Rent, Board, Campus Center or other various fees.

I also, firmly support the actions of the Student Senate in its attempt to prevent said fees from increasing.

Perspective On Cuba: The Revaluation In Education

(LNS) -- Having realized that a free society is impossible without an informed and educated people, in 1959 Cuba embarked upon a massive educational campaign. Even before the Revolution came to power, when Fidel and his comrades were fighting in the Sierra Maestra Mountains, informal schools were set up to teach the local farmers and their families to read and write.

When the Revolution did come to power, education went into high gear. The great Literacy Campaign of 1961 almost abolished illiteracy. During that one year over 700,000 people were taught to read and write. School construction and teacher training have always been among the highest priorities of the Revolution. Today there are over 2,300,000 people studying in Cuba.

To increase the availability of education was an important first step. But Cuba feels that it must go much further. The fundamental character of education must be changed to meet the needs of a Revolutionary society.

Tremendous discussion has gone on among students, parents, teachers, and Government and Party leaders as to the goals and methods of a truly revolutionary education.

Prime Minister Fidel Castro Ruz spoke about some of these goals when he visited Chile last November. The speech that follows is taken from his address to Chilean university students. Parts of it have been rearranged to preserve continuity:

How should the society of the future contemplate the matter of education? How should it contemplate the matter of the formation of man? It has been said that the ideal society of the future is that from which the caste differences between manual and intellectual workers disappear, in which everyone is both a manual and an intellectual worker.

IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO THINK OF MAN ONLY AS AN INTELLECTUAL, JUST AS IT IS IMPOSSIBLE TO THINK OF HIM ONLY AS A MACHINE.

Is this perhaps a Utopia? What do we do with certain men? Do we condemn them to be intellectuals for life? And what do we do with others? Do we condemn them to be animals for life? Some of them will have to be down in the depths of a coal or copper mine, or doing some kind of physical work, while others will spend the day shut up in a room, working with their minds. And of them will be unhappy. It is impossible to think of many only as an intellectual, just as it is impossible to think of him only as a machine. And there's no question about it that, throughout history, from a physical standpoint, man has been essentially a machine. Society was divided into classes, and it was divided into these two types of workers.

INTELLECTUALS ARE SOMETHING LIKE TRIBAL WITCH DOCTORS, MEDICINE MEN, MAGICIANS, THE ONES WHO KNOW SOMETHING.

We believe that every human being in the society of the future should have the opportunity to develop his mental faculties to the maximum. But in order to make this possible, it will also be necessary for all human beings to participate, with their hands, in the creation of the wealth man needs if he is to live.

We don't want our university graduates to become an intellectual elite divorced from the realities of life, divorced from the spirit of the workers. Naturally, this is a problem we can speak about today because the intellectuals are a minority, the consequences are all to obvious: they're something like tribal witch doctors, medicine men, magicians, the ones who know something.

In our country, it was general practice to elect doctors as mayors or quite frequently as Representatives. They were the ones who had the privilege of having some sort of knowledge. And right away they became rich and were absorbed by the bourgeoisie. This was one of the problems which we faced over the years--until we found the solutions which, in our opinion, will solve this problem.

In the University we established what was known as the University Reform. However, we realized later that the reforms we had put into effect were along the lines of the demands posed for university reform within a bourgeois society. These included the old aspirations of the University, such as autonomy and full-time teachers, plus some aspects of an economic nature.

Afterwards, all that turned out to be inadequate. When we spoke of university reform 12 years ago, we didn't have even the slightest inkling of what our present ideas would be like.

We were running the risk of replacing papa with the state. Before, it was papa who paid all the expenses for the student, and afterwards it was the state that paid all the expenses. But the student didn't change. A lot of revolutionary talk, a lot of political instruction, a lot of indoctrination, if you wish: but in the end, man is not simply speculation or abstract ideas. What makes a man is his life, his habits, his everyday activities.

WHAT WE WANT IS FOR INTELLECTUAL WORKERS TO LOOK JUST LIKE ALL OTHER WORKERS.

We are headed toward a goal: the combination of study and work at all levels--in junior high schools, in the senior high schools and in the universities. And we are already building elementary schools where the fourth graders will engage productive tasks. Now what we want is for intellectual workers to look just like all other workers.

What does "to educate" mean? What is it? It means preparing man--from the very moment he begins to have an awareness of his most elementary duties to society--to produce the material and spiritual goods that society needs and to produce them equally, with the same share of responsibility for everyone.

Do you think a university can do better than a factory as a center of education? A university can be an excellent center for theoretical teaching. In fact, it may be even more, a university may have laboratories and centers of investigation, but it will never educate a man better than a factory will.

Puerto Ricans Plan Political Prisoner Conference

"The only crime that I have committed in my life--and I am willing to commit it again, if that is called a crime--is to love my country."

——Carlos Feliciano, Puerto Rican political prisoner

(LNS)——With repression growing stronger, several different Puerto Rican groups have issued a call for a conference in New York City on Puerto Rican political prisoners. The general meeting will be held on March 19.

The conference will include workshops on the Third World and its struggle for liberation as well as discussions on particular political prisoners. It will be preceded by subconferences that will be held around the New York-New Jersey area to bring the problems of political prisoners to the local level.

Keeping in mind the need for a coalition that can maintain strong support and pool resources more efficiently, the objectives of the conference will be:

*To denounce the colonial status of Puerto Rico and the political repression that is systematically being carried out against its people.

*To develop a campaign using all available resources to secure general amnesty for those brothers and sisters that are on trial for political "crimes."

*To educate the Puerto Rican people, the North American people and all the Third World nations about the circumstances of these cases and their historical context and consequences.

*To share experiences, knowledge, techniques and resources among the different existing defense committees for political prisoners.

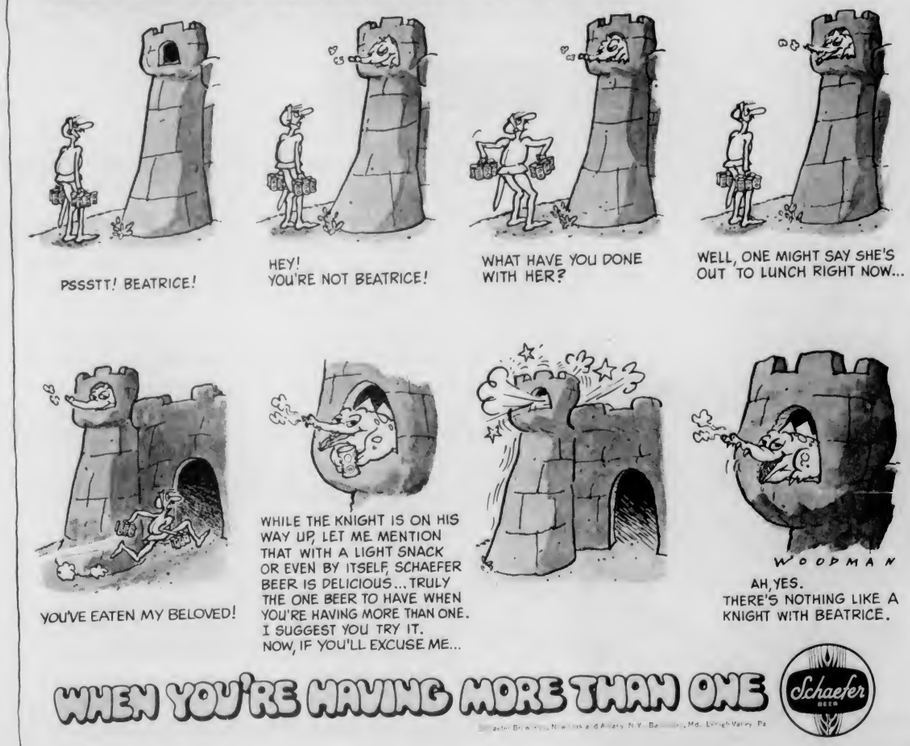
*To help in the creation of an organization to deal specifically with Puerto Rican political prisoners.

Conference sponsors plan to have a book about Puerto Rican political prisoners coming out of the experience. They will also write pamphlets about the best ways to organize defense groups.

The conference committee is stressing the historical importance of the struggle to make people realize that since the intervention of the U.S. in Puerto Rico in 1898, and especially from 1950 on, the Puerto Rican people have been in a state of war with the U.S. colonial powers.

Some Puerto Rican political prisoners have been in jail since as long ago as 1950 when there was an armed insurrection that was crushed by Puerto Rican police acting on orders directly from President Truman's government. At the present moment, there are more than 34 Puerto Rican political prisoners. They come not only from the island but also from struggles that have been rapidly developing for the past three years among Puerto Rican communities in the United States.

Among the most famous are Lolita Lebron, arrested in 1954 after she led three men in an armed attack on Congress to draw attention to the Puerto Rican struggle; Humberto Pagan, accused of killing a Puerto Rican policeman during the confrontations in March 1971 at the University of Puerto Rico; Carlos Feliciano, charged in 1970 with having conspired a bomb several places in New York; and most recently, Pablo "Yoruba" Guzman, Minister of Information of the Young Lords Party, charged with draft evasion and now facing a ten year sentence.



Press Passes

(LNS)——In a surprise turnabout February 15, the San Diego Police Department granted the San Diego Door, a local underground paper, police press passes. "It was a pretty far-out victory," said one member of the Door staff, which recently opened up another office in Los Angeles. "We were expecting a long court battle although we were pretty confident that we would win in the end."

Up From Silence

Something is happening!

There's a strange tense quiet on campus that seems ready to start erupting.

This quiet started just after the Kent and Jackson State massacres when, in fear perhaps, we all crawled into our holes to dodge the bullets, both verbal and real, flying over our heads.

The year and a half following was marked by what many called the "return to apathy". Who could deny it. We all lay in our burrows, minds clouded in blue smoke, afraid to speak out for fear of being shot at.

Now, with this "silent age" revealing what happens when the government runs unchallenged, students are beginning to talk and question again.

That apathy produced "Spring Concert" and the Yearbook. Now concern fund S.O.S. and "The Friends of Belchertown."

That apathy elected Nixon and Sargent. Concern can elect McGovern and, at least, challenge Sargent.

The time is ripe for us to turn things around. Belchertown is ready to be turned around. As the Collegian pointed out yesterday the Spring Concert is NOT more important than that human zoo.

Students can help change Belchertown by signing the petitions now circulating asking the Student Senate to transfer the funds now reserved for the Spring Concert to S.O.S.

Attorney General Quinn is speaking tonight at the SU Ballroom. Shouldn't we tell him that it's his duty to protect the innocent at Belchertown; that his anti-abortion feelings are wrong?

Next week Governor Sargent will be here. Shouldn't we tell him that we won't sit idly by and watch him destroy higher education in Massachusetts; that a 40% budget cut at Belchertown is "inhumane treatment"?

If we don't speak-out things will only continue on the same course. Change is needed and we can start it.

Let's begin ...again.

After Bathing At Phillips Street

Idealism fired the breast of every American college student in May of 1970. We were on strike, to stay on strike until Panthers were freed and wars were ended. If the cause called for silk-screening teashirts, painting slogans on buildings, and smoking dope in the ROTC building, well, we were ready to make those sacrifices. My friends and I were very loyal to the strike. Except for the week I took off to drink soup and read comic books in the infirmary, we were out there doing our proverbial bit. Only once did we abondon our comrades-in-arms, and then only for a very noble purpose. We were out to fulfill in our own lives the dream that has burned in the brain of every student ever to bed down for the night in all the Hamlins and Melvilles of higher education: we went to find an apartment off-campus.

Naive and impressionable we were. Burdened with a background of great wealth and general opulence, we were not about to settle for an unfashionable address. None of us hailed from Nob Hill, Sutton Place, or Louisburn Square, but we did after all come from places like Waverly Avenue in Watertown, Alba Road and Abbott Road in Wellesley Hills, and the exclusive Goat Hill section ofBeverly. We simply had to be in a suitable neighborhood in one of Emerald City's more pleasant suburbs. (At the time we didn't expect that the land of Oz would see revolution within three semesters. One can never be too careful just before the Revolution, Right, Anastasia?)

Off we went in search of such an address. We had the name of a realtor, Dennison H. Jones and Sons, who were reputed to have something suitable. We were immediately gratified to find that they would rent to no one making under $10,000,000 a day. They had no choice, really, if one was to pay their rents. Fortunately they were able to offer us what we were looking for. Though none of us had yet reached adulthood, we had already made it to the top; we now lived on Phillips Street.

Oh, the joy of Phillips Street living. Even the cockroaches had class. How can I describe the dynamic thrill of sharing a six room apartment with such distinguished company: Rich Dinkin, well-known connoisseur of wine, women, and song, and bullshit artist extraordinaire; Peter Massa, master chef, trivia expert and bon vivant; Dave Duncan, chronicler of Napoleon's Campaigns and ace bridge player; all this plus my humble self. Upstairs dwelt Peter Pascarelli, editor of Emerald City's most influential daily newspaper, and Mark Silverman, his trusty sidekick. Each night I said my prayers to God, thanking him for letting me live on Phillips Street.

Reality soon set in. When September came there returned to Emerald City and twenty thousand students of Oz State University. They returned to their modest homes in developments called Southwest, Orchard Hill, Northeast, and Central. They did not seem to know that Phillips St. even existed. What is the point of being on top when they can't see you from below, and don't even know they want to? Everyone who read the Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test knew that Perry Lane was the place to live in Palo Alto (before they tore it down), but who knew about Phillips Street?

Having gained control of the Commuter Assembly, we were still unknown. Into the breach stepped Rich Dinkin and Dave Williams. A bust in Southwest caused a protest meeting. By this time, Dave Williams was Managing Editor of the Emerald City Collegian. He was also among the first Phillips Street aficinadoes. Rich Dinkin discoursed on the matter of busts; and the photographers closed his shutter for one immortal moment. Williams knew raw sex appeal when he saw it, and the next day's paper featured a front page blowup of Rich Dinkin. The caption of course mentioned his address as Phillips Street.

From there it was all down hill. Dinkin was cast in the role of Dinkinus of Phillippi in Decline And Fall... (MDC, 2/22/71) and the public knew that Phillippi referred to Phillips Street. Acting as Attorney in the LaMacchia cause celebre, Dinkin became overnight a cult hero to millions. All to the greater glory of Phillips Street.

There were other signs. Dave Williams couldn't begin an article without mentioning the bartender, Peter Massa of the "Phillips Street Revolutionaries." When the Commuter Assembly held an election to fill two vacant Senate seats, the Senate ads proclaimed "The 33 Phillips Street Gang" in huge, headline-sized letters, and the fact that we were holding an election in small type. In his book, The Making Of A President, 1971, Theodore White expresses his opinion that the impetus for Lee Sandwen's victory was a letter of endorsement from 33 Phillips Street.

Many seek the public eye; few attain it. Those who do cling to it oftentimes. We stayed at Phillips Street, right? Wrong. We left. It was kind of a lousy place to live. Shalom.

NSAC Keeps United Front

A major breakthrough was realized at last weekend's National Student Antiwar Conference held in New York City. Attending and participating in the conference were representatives of Youth for McGovern, Youth for Lindsay, and Youth and Muskie. They supported the proposal of the Student Mobilization Committee to build and participate in national demonstrations for immediate withdrawal, planned for April 22 in New York. This development will add signifigant forces this spring to the independent antiwar movement.

A number of important political points were raised and clarified at that conference. To begin with, the principles of the SMC were questioned on two occasions. At the start of the conference there arose a ground swell among certain sectarian groups to exclude the Muskie, Lindsay, and McGovern representatives. The YSA and the SWP were in the forefront of defending the right of any individual or group, willing to fight for immediate, total and unconditional withdrawal of all US forces, to participate. Their arguments in favor of maintaining a principled, non-exclusionary stance carried the vote and the conference continued. At another point, a small grouping called the Workers League proposed that the conference endorse the Socilaist Workers Party presidential ticket of Linda Jenness and Andrew Pulley. Pulley himself took the floor to make a counter proposal. He said that he and Linda appreciated the proposed endorsement, and invited individual conference participants to support the campaign. However, Pulley said, it would be incorrect for the anti-war movement to endorse any party or candidate because that would destroy the movement's independence. Such a move would obstruct the active participation of supporters of other candidates and those not committed to any candidate, thus undercutting the strength of the movement. Pulley's counterproposal, that the antiwar movement reassert its independence and build the April 22nd demonstrations in a strictly non-partisan basis, was carried.

The conference was an object lesson in the theory and practice of a united front. A united front is a political formation built around a single demand or particular goal, on which diverse political groups can agree to work together. Each organization that participates retains the right to raise its full program within that united front. This formation differs from a popular front in which the programs of the participating groups are subordinated to the politics of the front. Literature tables were set up by every group in the lobby of the conference hall, their politics were out in the open, and discussion was brisk, to say the least.

As has been quite clear on this campus, and all over the country, the YSA consistently opposes the campaigns of capitalist candidates of the Democratic and Republican parties through the SWP campaign of Linda Jenness and Andrew Pulley. Campaign interventions, debates, leaflets, speaking tours, and literature are only a few of the methods involved in this year's political confrontations. The fight has often been bitter, as might be expected, considering the issues at stake. However, as parties to the dispute testified last weekend, our vast political differences will not divide us on the question of the war in Southeast Asia.

As far as I know, none of the presidential candidates except Linda Jenness have stated that their position on the war question is for immediate, total and unconditional withdrawl of all US forces from Southeast Asia. But the fact that their organized youth support have openly advocated that position as their own, and have agreed to help build national demonstrations this spring, is a great stride toward ending that war.

The fundamental political differences between the YSA and the supporters of capitalist candidates, far from ending, will undoubtedly sharpen as we approach November. However, we in the Amherst YSA invite supporters of McGovern, Lindsay, Muskie, and others to join us in working with the UMass Student Mobilization Committee. The next Mobe meeting is scheduled for Monday, March 6th at 6:30 PM in the Mobe office. Everyone in the SMC welcomes the addition of new forces into a principled unity and a concerted effort to fight for immediate withdrawal.

Letters To The Editor

An Open Letter From Pan-African Union

To the Editor:
An open letter from Pan-African students union to the Fine Arts Council.
To the Director:
This letter comes to you from the Pan-African Students Union at the University concerning the proposed two-day African Film Festival, featuring films, slide presentations, panel discussions and art exhibits.

In view of the total ignorance on campus concerning African political, economic, and social issues, we appreciate your effort in undertaking such an endeavor. It is needless to emphasize the urgent need of keeping the University community informed of both the explosive and harmonious developments that are unfolding in this world. We hope that such activities will be geared towards un-masking the usual "benign-neglect" policy of the West towards Africa in general, and the Liberation Movements, that are waging an uncompromising struggle against fascism and its NATO backbone in particular.

However, we wish to express our utmost and unequivocal indignation to your deliberate exclusion of the Pan-African Union from the decision of what is and what is not to be presented and discussed during the Film Festival. Taking into consideration the still rampant attitude of many "Africanists" (the "we know what is good for them" policy) towards Africans, it is not hard to imagine why you chose to present our case in this manner. If nothing else, you at least owe it to the public to see that the party directly concerned is consulted before hand. What makes us more furious is the fact that you went and fully scheduled the program you found appropriate, even after a member of our Executive Committee had cautioned you not to finalize any plan without our knowledge. The least you could have done was was to let us know of your decision to be the sole spokesman of Africa. The fact that you did not, openly manifested the respect you have towards Africa and the Africans you are so "proudly" to present.

Please be content that you are not the only one operating in such a manner. It is almost a classical case that "big powers" refuse to acknowledge the existence of those that they do not particularly favor till the hour of desperation!

While we again condemn the way the whole thing was planned, we never the less have decided not to boycott the Activity this time, and further urge the general public to come to the discussions, etc., so as to acquaint themselves with such monstrosities as Apartheid and Western imperialism that operate on our still enslaved motherland.

Sincerely,
Pan-African Students Union

Hotbed Of Apathy

To the Editor:
The writings in the MDC of Carole Weiner (Feb. 28), Bob Medieros (Feb. 29) and Bob Callahan (Mar. 1) are an appeal that any person cannot bypass without some honest thinking and soul searching.

It looks as though all the spiel about "UMass- the hotbed of apathy" must be real. But $12,000 for a five-hour concert is not only unbelievable, it also shows an insight to the mentality and characteristics of the 'mob society' as exemplified by the students of UMass.

After the spree when the students return to their dorms, and when they get back into the rut of life, they will then follow what seems to be their favorite pastime - griping, and a height of disinterest in the society around them.

It is surprising that this affluent society which moves so much in trying to help the Third World, finds itself unable to help her own people. (It is equally surprising that you have noticed this kind of apathy among foreign students in their disassociation with your society.) The ones who want to prevent war on the other side of the globe, cannot bring peace in their own backyard. The self-styled experts on world politics and international brotherhood, who want to develop the 'poor, underdeveloped nations', do not find a purpose in bettering the inhuman conditons and stark poverty that the lesser fortunate here have to face.

Of course, selfish motives always to get the better of the students, whether it is in grabbing for a spring concert, using the pinball machines, stealing from a departmental library or Goodell, or following the 'Western honorable profession' of ripping-off what-is-not-yours.

Escapism was never a way of life, and apathy, disinterest, avoiding-the-issue, and varied excuses of time all fall under the same category. You cannot complain about a situation if you are making a practical attempt yourself to bring in a solution. It is not right that you gripe about a 0.5¢ increase in soft drinks if you are going to squander twelve grand. Ethically it is very incorrect that the Governor should cut back a 40% in requested funds if he has never ever visited that place. What a shame that you UMies do not care!

It would be interesting to see your reactions when you are faced with a $300 or more hike in fees next year. It would be fascinating to hear your comments when the dining commons raises its charges the next time.

You talk about impersonalisation on this campus. What are you doing to ease it? How have you been instrumental in helping the children in the Boltwood project? You talk about an unfriendly society. When did you last befriend anyone? When did you last be a friend to a lonely person? This is your land, these are your people. Do not be a stick-in-the-mud. Get to know whats happening and play your part to create a better world for your children. START NOW. Don't wait until one of your children has to be put in Belchertown State Hospital. Don't wait until Gov. Sargent pushes up your fees another three hundred bucks. Start now and care. Don't be dead to the community. This is your chance to show the world that you care.

What is your choice - a concert for five hours & a life-time of human destruction, or a helping hand for the helpless?

Letter From Howland

To the Editor:
I have just learned that a representative of a company called Linencrest Inc. of Indianapolis, Indiana has been offering students the opportunity to buy linens and other dry goods for about $450.00 on a finance type of contract. At the bottom of this contract there is a statement as follows:

"This contract Non-Cancelable and no refunds made."

According to the Attorney General's Consumer Protection office this Statement renders this contract void.

THIS CONTRACT IS IN VIOLATION OF MASSACHUSETTS LAW CHAPTER 93 SECTION 48 AND OTHERS AND MAY BE RESCINDED BY THE CONSUMER.

To rescind and void this contract students should write to the company within three days declaring the contract void and demanding a refund. Keep your copy of the contract. This can be done through my office for any student wishing me to do it.

I also suggest that so long as this company is disinclined to conform itself to the Laws of Massachusetts that its representatives be refused admission to the campus and the dormitories.

To the Editor:
The article in the Collegian on Wednesday by Bob Callahan asked the Concert Committee to justify why the money should not be spent on the S.O.S. Project. He calls for the Student Senate to justify where its priorities are really at.

I find the Student Senate and the Concert Committee acting in a hypocritical manner. The other day there was a booth sponsored by the Student Senate asking students to note that they felt that there should be no fees increases for the coming academic year. The Student Senate and the Rents and Fees Committee have consistently attacked the administration because of what they feel are often exorbitant and wasteful spending of student fees. They have told the administration that the present fee levels must be maintained because of the increasing financial burden that the students are carrying. They are now through USCC lobbying to maintain the present rate of tuition.

I feel as does Mr. Callahan that the spending of student fee for an outdoors concert is both selfish and hypocritical. It is my belief that if the Concert Committee and the Student Senate continue in their preparation for the concert they will further erode any basis for maintenance of the present fee structures. There are a number of ways that the money now allocated to the Concert Committee could be better used to benefit both the students and the community. If the students are going to argue for fee maintenance and tuition stability then they must treat there own tax money wisely. If you put the merit of a five hour concert on the same level with a tuition increase or such worthy projects as S.O.S. or the Boltwood Project then you deserve to have your fees increased accordingly. So perhaps some of you will have fun this year but because of your fun this year, how many won't be able to make it back next year?

To the Editor:
The article entitled Free University Set Up for Jews appearing in Wednesday's Collegian was a misleading and inaccurate report. In hope that the misinformation will be cleared up the following is provided.

Within the past few years the melting pot dream of the great American empire has given way to a surfacing of ethnicity. The hope of American society no longer rests on the projected assimilation of all its diverse elements into one unified, homogeneous body. Indeed, the trend has given way to a new reality which is almost the reverse. The hope of America's future depends on the ability of her people to assert their ethnic origins while learning to live with tolerance and sensitivity towards the ethnicity of others. It is of utmost importance that we not allow ourselves to become insensitive to today's existent ethnic realities.

It is to this end that the Free University of Electric Jewish Thought was founded. Merkabah University is open to peoples of all origins who are interests in some aspect of Judaic thought. We are a clearing house for young people, particularly of Jewish origin who wish to interact within a common framework; people who have become disaffected with the false stereotypes imposed on them by others, as well as the pathetic acquiescense to commonly held anti-semitic ideas by contemporary Jewish institutions.

We have been in operation for three weeks. It has come as no surprise to us that two our our most popular courses have followed the rising interest in this country in mysticism. The most successful course had dealt with the problems young Jews have confronted in a secular world. The impact of the Jewish Holocaust on the world has not yet been defined and this has been validated by the interest in the course dealing with the Holocaust.

Merkabah University's courses are offered Monday through Thursday nights in room 420 of the Student Union. Stop by and pick up a brochure or call 5-2526.

Second Coming

The dawn, sprinkled with honeydew, maintains a sort of peace where once she sat, holding a rosary to her lips.
The fences are old, now;
the shadows of hummingbirds cling to their bottoms and the rustle of an oak imbibes the music of her fallen laughter.

It is not easy to be a goddess.
It takes time, imagination, and money.
That is why, perhaps,
she fled from style and persecution
so long ago, not giving any of the flowers around her time to mature.
That is why, perhaps, she sips tea in Akron now, immune to the canopies and gargoyles memories and moonlight may surely manufacture.

It takes time to kill the memories, time to manufacture lovesongs where once white travesties of monuments stood still for spring cleaning.
It takes time to cleanse the air, time to disinfect the lilacs of their dismal autumnal decay.
The dawn, sprinkled with memories,
maintains a sort of pose:

a crass dereliction on this Sunday, filled with hypocrisy and tea-stains.
If it rains in Minnesota, it rains here;
weather is immune to discrepancy;
the November tides play no favorites.
So she dines, and prefers to forget the wonderful novicaine of another year, when ribbons and valentines were things of the future.
She will finger no more rosaries, and if one small bead does catch her eye,

she will kill it with a sponge.

Porno Clubs Vanish From Copenhagen

COPENHAGEN (AP)-This Danish capital is no longer a mecca for seekers after sin. The live sex shows and the porno clubs have all but vanished.

Pornography still is unrestricted in Denmark, but the police and the tax collector have struck the seats of sin a deadly blow.

The police have closed about 60 shows and clubs since they began a drive just before Christmas.

The reason behind the campaign against sex is that the criminal underworld muscled in and was channeling the lush profits into narcotics, stolen goods and smuggling.

Today, of the few porno clubs known to exist in and around Copenhagen, one is 25 miles out of town.

The campaign was kicked off by the police license department. It found the clubs either had no license or had violated requirements for a listed member.

The license fee in only about $10 but many clubs chose not to apply since this would make them known to police. To qualify as a private club a regularly elected board is required and members must sign up at least 24 hours before attending club activities.

Then the tax collectors arrived. They demanded prompt payment of income and sales taxes.

The procedure is reminiscent of one used in the United States in the Roaring '20s against Al Capone. Unable to obtain evidence of him on an income tax evasion charge and sent him to prison.

Heavy fines and payment of tax arrears dealt a crippling blow to many Danish clubs. Panic ensued when police began indicting club owners, taxi drivers, hotel doormen, travel agency clerks, porno shop salesmen and others.

Charges ranged from tax evasion to illegal sale of tickets to live shows and sex clubs.

To anyone venturing into Copenhagen's porno and sex club world, it was evident that it was dominated by the underworld. There were gangland-style fights between rival clubs.

Police spokesmen said they were convinced many clubs were financed by underworld figures who used revenues to finance criminal activities.

Maine Gives 18 Year Olds Full Rights

AUGUSTA, Maine (AP)-On a 17-13 roll call after a brief debate, the Senate Wednesday enacted legislation giving full adult rights to 18 year olds. Maine's present age of majority is 20.

The bill, sponsored by Rep. Jon Lund, R-Augusta, is expected to be signed Thursday by Democratic Gov. Kenneth M. Curtis. It will become law 91 days after the current special session adjourns.

Eighteen year olds have had the vote since ratification of a federal constitutional amendment last year. Lund's bill will give them all rights, including those of purchasing liquor and entering into contracts.

The measure was redrafted to protect minors enrolled in public schools by allowing them to continue their education tuition-free until they are 20. Presently, adults must pay to attend regular public schools.

The chief opponents of the bill were Republican senator Walter N. Hichens of Eliot and Bennett D. Katz of Augusta. Teaming up to support the measure were Wakine G. Tanous, R-East Millinocket and Floyd L. Harding, D-Presque Isle.

"Let them be kids until they're 20. They'll be adults for a long, long time," said Hickens who attacked the provision lowering the drinking age as the bill's greatest drawback.

"Liquor is the most commonly used drug today, and is the start toward hard drugs for many teenagers," added the first-term senator, who claimed youths he had talked with were against Lund's proposal.

Informer Testifies At Berrigan Trial

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP)-The Rev. Philip Berrigan's initial priority as a militant antiwar chieftain was the blowing up of heating tunnels in Washington, according to an FBI-intercepted letter read Wednesday at his trial.

"The District is still the elusive golden fleece," the Catholic priest wrote Sister Elizabeth McAlister June 29, 1970.

The letter was turned over to the FBI by informer Boyd Douglas, star government witness at the federal conspiracy trial of Berrigan and six codefendants, including the nun.

"Since resources appear available for the subterranean project in the District this should have priority for the winter of 1970-1971," Berrigan is quoted in one of more than a dozen letters read into the trial report by Asst. Atty. Gen. William Lynch.

However, less than two months later, the government claims, a purported plan to kidnap presidential aide Henry A. Kissinger threatened to push the tunnel bombing scheme into the background.

"Why not coordinate it with the one against Capital utilities?" Berrigan was quoted as writing in an Aug. 22, 1970 letter that is part of the indictment against him and the others.

Lynch's reading of the letter was timed to reach its climax with the August 22 missive, one of many exchanged between Berrigan and Sister McAlister. She was allegedly his chief lieutenant outside the walls of the Lewisburg, Pa., federal prison.

Berrigan, 48, entered Lewisburg in the spring of 1970 to begin a six-year term for destroying draft board records.

Douglas testified that he was recruited by Berrigan to smuggle letters in and out for the priest. Douglas, a 31-year-old convict, was able to leave and re-enter the prison daily as a study-release student at nearby Bucknell University. He was paroled Dec. 16, 1972 from a term for transportation of fraudulent checks and assault on an FBI agent.

He turned FBI informer while serving as Berrigan's courier. Douglas testified, and provided copies of the letters to the federal agency.

The defense is seeking to subpoena FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover to produce voluminous records relating to Douglas' criminal record and his work as an FBI informant. A government motion to throw out the Hoover subpoena was taken under consideration during the day.

Draft Counselor's Corner

Election Fever Raises Clouds

By RICHIE GEFFIN

Up until elections in November, we can safely assume that all pressure is off as far as draft calls are concerned. Now what does that mean for us? Does it mean that we can all sit back and say no sweat, I'm a free man? Does it mean that we should forget about the people who are still dying in Vietnam or the guys that had to go to Canada because they were morally opposed to war? Or, does it mean that we should forget about the possibility that when (?) Nixon is re-elected he could re-escalate in Vietnam and resume draft calls? All three of these things are important to consider in an election year where the 18-21 set could do a hell of a lot if they only got their shit together.

A congressional committee recently has been looking into the possibility of amnesty for the guys that split to Canada. President Nixon in his state of the union address talked about showing compassion to our "boys" that left the country. Everybody all of a sudden is getting election fever. What does that mean for us? It means that we have to show support for our brothers in Canada.

First of all, they have done nothing wrong, so we shouldn't be talking in terms of amnesty. If they must play semantics and they insist upon calling it amnesty allright--but it has to be unconditional amnesty. We are the ones that are going to pave the way to bringing them back.

What about Vietnam? The war is by far not over. Nixon could very easily bring our boys home ("wind down the war") and continue fighting it with our jet bombers. We can't forget about the people of Vietnam, because the shit is still flying over there.

A third thing to think about is, what is going to happen when Nixon is re-elected (or Muskie is elected--basically they are interchangable parts)? What is to stop them from re-escalating and resuming draft calls? We have to be prepared.

I'm saying that we shouldn't sit back and think that all our problems are solved just because there is no immediate danger to us. Look beyond your own problem areas, and do a little speculating as to what you see for the future of this country.

One quick note: There will be a draft counselor's training course in Southwest, on Tuesday evenings, starting March 7. Each class will meet from 7-10 for four weeks. It will be offered on a pass/fair basis and will be offered for one credit. The course will be offered to both male and female members of the UMass community and will be taught by Gil Salk, co-ordinator of the Draft Counseling Services. There will be a five dollar fee for materials, but it is negotiable for those whose finances are shaky. Those interested in registering for the course should call Wally Silva in the SW Area Office at 545-2803. PEACE.

3 Co-Eds Enter Pageant

Three UMass students have entered the Miss Northampton Scholarship Pageant being held tomorrow night at Northampton High School.

Susan Atwood, a freshman, will compete in the Pageant performing a musical monologue.

A Human Development major who plans to teach exceptional children, Ms. Atwood sings in the University Chorus. She was first runner-up in the 1971 Wareham, Mass., Junior Miss Contest.

Geraldine Misa, in her Junior year, majors in Speech Therapy. She is a Northampton resident and works part-time at the Big Y.

Ms. Misa was voted to represent Holyoke Community College in the St. Patrick's Day Parade in Holyoke.

Patricia Tompkins, who will graduate this spring, is a member of Mademoiselle Magazine's College Board Staff and works at the Campus Police Department as a Security Assistant.

Ms. Tompkins would like to continue her education at State University of New York at Albany for a Masters in Criminal Justice.

Tickets for the Pageant may be obtained from the Greater Northampton Chamber of Commerce, Northampton National Bank, Radio Station WHMP, and Hotel Northampton.

Heart Specialists Diet

CHICAGO (AP) — What do heart specialists eat to avoid increasing the risk of heart attacks?

Those attending the annual meeting of the American College of Cardiology chose their lunches here Wednesday from menus designed to reduce the cholesterol, fats and calories which are considered to contribute to the development of heart disease.

The menu: chilled apricot nectar, baked filet of Boston scrod with lemon sauce, braised celery, imported Belgian carrots, baked apple in cider, and coffee.

That provided 475 calories. The average business luncheon totals 1,500 calories, one cardiologist said.

Cardiologists at a news briefing said this is the first major medical meeting at which alteration of diets has been tried and they expressed the hope that other medical groups will follow their example.

Dr. Robert F. Zelis of the University of California at Davis, who worked with the Conrad Hilton Hotel in developing the special menus, said they are based on elimination of all meat fats, egg yolks, butter and pan drippings in cooking and baking.

Unsaturated margarine made of liquid safflower oil or corn oil is the fat substitute used in pastries, gravies and sauces and on the table. Margarines made of vegetable oil or coconut oil are not used.

Salt and sugar substitutes also are used on the table.

Lecithin, a naturally unsaturated fat, is substituted for egg yolk, giving foods the consistency and some of the color of yolk.

Lean meats trimmed of fats before cooking are used, and cold cuts-especially pressed meats-are ruled out. Skins are removed from chickens before they are cooked.

Skim milk is used instead of whole milk. As a cream substitute, a combination of skim and powdered milk, mixed a day in advance, is used.

Most desserts are fruit dishes, and no chocolate or ice cream is served.

Selectmen Begin Reorganizing

By CHARLEY BERKOW

The Amherst Board of Selectmen, with two new faces this week, made moves towards a reorganization of itself and towards the eventual establishment of official operating procedures, in their meeting Monday night.

The board also dealt with complaints from citizens about several matters, including a dog and a proposed town acceptance of certain privately owned streets, and met with the town manager about new developments presented by the Special Town Meeting of Feb. 14.

This was the first Board of selectmen meeting attended by Leo Bouchard and Bob Garvey. They were elected to the board last Tuesday.

Under a temporary organization plan submitted by Selectman Michael Sullivan Jr., the board elected a chairmen (Selectman Merle Howes), a Vice-Chairman (Sullivan) and a clerk (Selectman Nancy Eddy), all unanimously.

Howes was authorized to appoint a 3-member subcommittee to study the board's operating procedures. The sub-committee, chaired by Sullivan, is to report back to the board on March 27.

The selectmen decided to meet weekly on Monday evenings, except for Monday-holidays, when they will meet on Tuesday morning. This will allow the quickest coverage by the Amherst Record, a weekly with a 12 p.m. Tuesday deadline.

Ms. Yarrows, the secretary, was asked to write to the state attorney general's office about policy with regard to character approvals, which are required for people trying to incorporate. Ms. Yarrows also asked to look into rubber stamp bearing the selectmen's signatures. Such stamps would save time in the meetings, as the selectmen have to sign all license approvals.

Donald Grant, a developer, appeared before the board claiming that proposed street acceptances by the town would jeopardize his bargaining position with respect to some of his land holdings in the area.

The board modified the proposals to restore Mr. Grant's bargaining position. It then recommended acceptance by the Town Meeting of several streets in newly developed areas.

The selectmen gave the School Building Committee control of the school building site. This will allow the committee to forbid Emory Howe from keeping his cows in a barn on the site, which he has been doing for several years.

The School Building Committee says that construction on the site will begin before the cows are removed from the barn, and they would be an unnecessary complication.

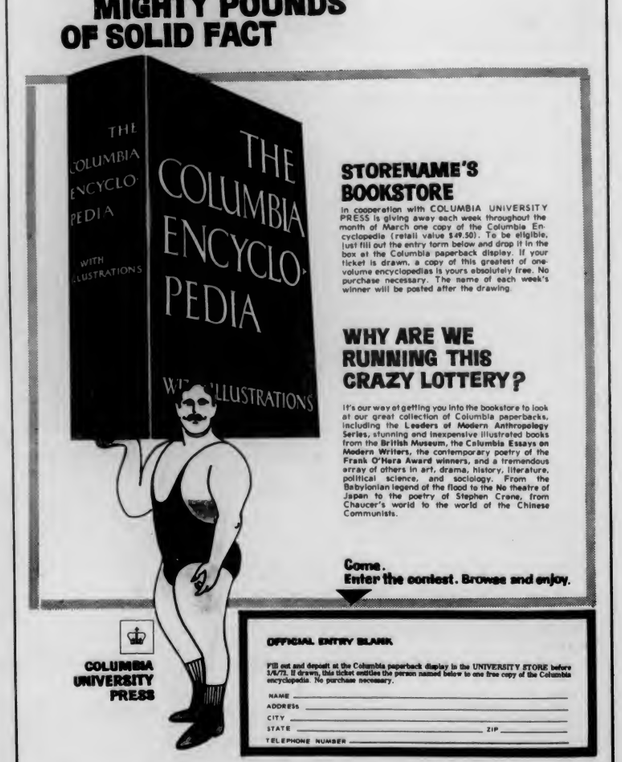
It is not known what will happen to some hay that Mr. Howe has in the bar. He had intended to feed it to the cows.

Ms. Dorothy Miller, of Columbia Street, asked the board to issue a restraining order against a dog in her area which after it did.

Town Manager Allen Torrey explained some of the effects of the bills passed in the Special Town Meeting of Feb. 14th and the problems that they would bring up for the board.

He also explained some financial matters due to come up in the future.

In response to a question from Merle Howes about policies regarkng door-to-door salesmen in Amherst, Torrey said that the town has no rules about them. He said that such rules might lend a legitimization from the town to salesmen who complied with them.



He said that he will check into how other towns deal with problems concerning door-to-door salesmen.

The selectmen elected to discuss various matters, on the warrant for the next Town Meeting, at the League of Women Voters information meeting on Wednesday, March 6.

In other business, the board granted various licenses, received two letters and authorized Selectman Bob Garvey to represent Amherst in the Saint Patrick's Parade in Holyoke.

Enema Bandit Strikes Again

GREEKS BEAR GIFTS in the form of their own yearbook at the University of South Florida, according to a piece in the Oracle newspaper there.

IFC prexy Bob Milhoan is quoted as making the decision after a dispute with the college yearbook concerning page and photo allotments.

Organizations will pay $25 for double page spreads and sell one page of advertisements to be included.

CHERCHEZ LA FEMME...it happened at Washington State that a frat lost its status as a recognized campus living center when they moved in four women students as paying non-members.

Frat officers said it was trying out the coed living program because it was in financial straits, according to the WSU Daily Evergreen.

ART COLLECTORS relieved the Indiana University art museum of $55,000 worth of treasure, the Daily Student reports.

The nine classic bronze sculptures and a stone carving were pocket-size. They were taken during museum hours by a thief who removed the screws which secured a transparent plastic case enclosing the art objects.

FIRE POWER of the Daily Reveille of Louisiana State U. showed up on its front pages, lately. Seems that an investigative team of three staffers found 60 violations of state fire prevention laws and so reported to the Administration.

When there was no action taken, the report was filed with the State Fire Marshal's Office. A team of inspectors verified the violations.

One campus official told the Reveille that "the University was exempt from state laws which require school buildings to have fire alarms because the buildings were built before the laws were passed."

A front page story tells that the University did move immediately to correct some of the discrepancies noted in the Reveille's expose.

"A new license plate, a new fire extinguisher and two refilled extinguishers have appeared on the campus fire truck."

WFCR Opens Funds Drive

Amherst, Mass.—WFCR, the Five-College public service FM station at the University of Massachusetts, opened its annual March fund drive yesterday.

The station is suppored by UMass, the four neighboring colleges (Amherst, Hampshire, Mount Holyoke and Smith), and its listeners. This year WFCR is making an appeal throughout the month of March for approximately $40,000 to maintain its operating schedule.

WFCR's essential financial needs may be broken down this way: personnel costs of $18,300, (between March 1 and the end of the fiscal year June 30) which includes salaries for 20 full and part-time staff; outstanding bills of $13,500; and current operating expenses of $8,200.

A number of features, fund-raising editions of regular programs and other special events are planned for the month. Tonight at 8:30 p.m., for example, Managers' Report No. 1 will feature WFCR Manager Charles Keenan and Business Manager Godwin Oyewole in a discussion of why WFCR needs listener support. They will answer listener questions on the air.

Sunday, March 5, will be an all-request day. Listeners who pledge a tax-deductible donation of $15 or more may hear the musical selection of their choice as long as it runs less than 20 minutes. Sunday at noon, Godwin's Mbari Mbayo African and Carribean music program will be aired in a special fund-raising edition. On Sunday night at 11, the concert program Nachtmusik will feature telephone requests.

Gymnasts End Season In Big Way

By JANE CROOK

PHILADELPHIA–The UMass Varsity Gymnastics team closed their dual meet season Tuesday night by crushing Temple, 152.9-148.65. In doing so, the Redmen have greatly enhanced their chances of a high finish in the East. The meet was surprisingly one-sided, with UMass winning four out of six events by large margins, and capturing twelve of eighteen places. The Redmen were expected to have a slight edge at Temple, but the 4-plus killing was totally unpredicted.

A decent effort by the Redmen, coupled with Temple's below-par performance, enabled UMass to come away with such an overwhelming victory. Temple's low team score was due mainly to specialist Mark Musy's absence, leaving an irreplaceable gap in the Owl line-up. Overall Massachusetts had some disappointing breaks, but fortunately the underclassmen came through with important scores, giving the Redmen the necessary depth to win, and definitely an optimistic outlook for next year.

Due to injury and line-up juggling, UMass entered only two men in the all-around event. Temple's sensation Mel Hill won first place honors with a 50.55 total, followed by Scuderi's 49.05, and Vacca's 48.85.

High scorer for UMass was Jay Thompsen, who had a beautiful 9.2 vault. Right behind him was cocaptain Tony Vacca earning a 9.15 on longhorse and a 9.0 on the high bar. One other Redman bettered the 9.0 mark as Jay Aronstein won still rings with a 9.15.

Floor exercise started off pretty shaky for the Redmen where they scored a full point below their normal event score. John Calabria and Jack Berner led the Redmen, each scoring 8.75, placing them in a 3-way tie for second. Mel Hill of Temple hit for a clean 9.1 in his best event to take first. In an event where UMass can usually hold their own, they lost .3 of a point, and since the entire meet was expected to have been decided by as much, it got pretty tense!

The sidehorse team proved a little erratic again, scoring only 24.0 points, but Temple could only manage a feeble 23.15. Rich Seikunas and Steve Scuderi turned in nice 8.25 and 8.'5 routines; Seikunas' good for first place. UMass picked up .55 of a point here, a lead they would never relinquish, but continually increase on each event.

Still rings was all Jay Aronstein: His sensational 9.15 was a full .65 of a point away from his nearest competitor. Danny Sper came through for the Redmen with a nice 8.5 performance, trying for second place with Temple's Rich Tobin.

The UMass vaulting team had a fantastic night, totalling a high 27.25, and picking up another .55 of a point. Jay Thompsen led the Redmen, sticking his 9.2 vault, closely followed by Tony Vacca's 9.15. Temple's Nasveschuk tied with Vacca for second with an equally fine vault.

Parallel bars was surprisingly weak for UMass, as they only scored 24.85, but Temple's outrageously low total of 22.8 gave the Redmen fans plenty of breathing room.

Temple took first and third in the event with their all-around men. Mel Hill and Dennis Seidel scoring 8.9 and 8.2, but didn't have a decent third team score, making their event total so low. UMass' p-bars wasn't exactly sensational, in fact it was about two points below average, but the Redmen's more balanced attack of Scuderi, Vacca, and Genest enabled them to pick up a full 2 points.

Massachusetts lost the high bar event, scoring only 25.80, which is low for them on usually one of their strongest events. Tony Vacca tied for first with Temple's Nasveschuk with a 9.0, beautifully mailing his double-twisting flyaway. Dennis Seidel from Temple took third with his 8.75 routine.

This was an extremely important win for the Redmen. A loss here would have killed their chance for a second place finish in the East.

JAY THOMPSEN, shown here in gymnastics action, played a big role in the important UMass win over Temple. He led the way in vaulting with a 9.2.

The eternal optimism that pervades the warm and sunny climates of Florida and the far southwest has made its annual emergence. Spring training is getting underway, and as usual the pie in the sky aspirations are apparent everywhere. In many respects it is quite understandable. Defeatist attitudes seldom result in winning seasons, and Horatio Alger stories are not unknown in the annuls of major league baseball.

Ask anyone who helped tear up the turf in Shea Stadium in '69 when the Miracle Mets won it all. Ask anyone who was in Kenmore Square five seasons ago when the Red Sox on the pennant. Carl Yazstremski had just concluded a season that made Horatio's feats look like kids' stuff. Men of lesser fame and, not coincidentally, less ability all seemed to perform as destiny had predicted.

Jose Tartabull will never be mistaken for Hank Aaron, nor Jim Lonborg for Tom Seaver. Undoubtedly these miraculous once in a lifetime achievements have a great influence on the perpetual optimism of the major league managers, but aren't their rosy outlooks getting rather trite? Just once I'd like to see some refreshingly different dialogue. Maybe something like this:

REPORTER: You were a real pennant contender last season. Do you think this might be the year you put it all together?

MANAGER: Are you kidding? With the problems we have, we'll be lucky to make the first division.

REPORTER: Why do you say that? What about that super trade you made in the off season?

MANAGER: Yeah, that was great. A rag arm pitcher and a stone fingered first baseman for half our starting infield.

REPORTER: I saw the squad doing sprints yesterday. They seem to be in terrific shape.

MANAGER: Sure, the ones you saw are. Trouble is most of the starters weren't there. They were all in the sauna trying to get off enough extra baggage to start sprinting.

REPORTER: What about your exhibition record? You're ten and one so far. Two days ago I saw you guys beat Baltimore. What about that?

MANAGER: Oh, we beat them all right. Except for Robinson, Belanger, Powell, Hendricks, Blair, and Buford they had their starting line-up in there against us.

PC Bombs Skaters, 7-3

By BILL BALLOU

Maybe it was because the game didn't mean a thing. Maybe it was because they were looking forward to the playoff game on Saturday vs. St. Anselm's. Maybe it was because everyone was in a holiday spirit with the good weather. Whatever it was, the UMass varsity hockey team had it, and it caused them to suffer a severe case of the giveaways and literally hand a 7-3 decision to the Providence College Friars last night at Orr Rink.

There was no question that PC had the Redmen in several departments, the most obvious being skating ability, but by no means were they superior by four goals. Some defensive lapses, some non-existent backchecking, and a couple of assists from the famed Orr Rink backboards resulted in the sad tale of woe.

Under normal circumstances, one would look at the seven goals on the scoreboard and immediately think evil thoughts toward whoever was in goal. Well, P.J. Flaherty was the man in goal for UMass, and the only people thinking evil thoughts toward him were some frustrated Providence shooters.

The senior goaltender was brilliant in the first two periods, facing 33 shots and stopping 29 of them. However, he can't really be faulted for any of the four goals and some of his saves were on the spectacular side.

His counterpart, PC's Brian Reynolds, was also brilliant in the goal, as he stopped 25 of 28 UMass shots during the course of the game.

Reynolds, a senior who hails from Calgary in Canada, had come into the match with the reputation of being one of the top two or three goaltenders in the East and he did nothing to make UMass fans think any differently.

He set the tone of things to come when at the 2:50 mark of the first period he made a big save on left wing Dan Reidy who had come busting in alone off the left side.

In fact, the opening minutes of that first stanza served more as a showcase of skills for the two opposing goalkeepers than a display the tight playoff style hockey that both teams will have to play when the big post season games roll around.

Despite the great goaltending, each team was able to find the net one time, with PC's John Martin scoring at the 6:12 mark and Jack Edwards getting that one back on a power play at 19:32.

Edwards continued to fly as the second period started, and missed on a breakaway at 1:28 before finally stuffing a three footer past Reynolds at 2:13 to give the Redmen a 2-1 lead, their only lead of the game.

From that point onward, it was all downhill for UMass. Len Alsfeld trickled in a five footer at 5:23 to tie the game up and Dave Kelly put PC ahead 3-2 on a fluke goal at the 6:25 mark.

On the Kelly goal, the puck was dumped into the UMass zone from center ice and was traveling around the chain link fence above the boards when it hit a stanchion at an odd angle and bounced right out in front of the net to Kelly. Flaherty was still waiting in back of his cage to stop the puck as it went by and had no chance.

With just 22 seconds left in the middle period the Friars scored what proved to be the winning goal as the puck took another weird bounce off the boards right onto the stick of PC's Sean Shanahan. This time Flaherty was in position but couldn't stop the freshman forward and it was 4-2.

The third period was an exercise in futility for Flaherty and his mates as they virtually handed the Friars three goals and the game. Even so, there was some good news in this final period of the regular season and it came off the stick of Pat Keenan.

The junior center, who had scored a record tying 28 goals coming into the game, fired home a forty foot slapshot on a power play at the 5:39 mark to record his 29th goal and break the record he set last year.

It not only marked the record breaker, but marked the end of a six game scoring drought that through two periods had shown signs of continuing. But Keenan rammed home the shot off the inside of the post to Reynold's glove side and the pressure was finally off.

Keenan's solo goal, and Edwards two were hardly enough to offset the seven PC scores. With the playoffs coming up and every game being more or less "sudden death", the Redmen can't afford the luxury of giving up seven goals. This was their last chance for mistakes, as the playoffs start this Saturday at Orr Rink against St. Anselms. Game time is 3 PM.

Frosh Hoopsters Win

By FRANK ANTOSIEWICZ

Last Tuesday evening, before the continuous heckling of a rambunctious Rhody corner, the UMass freshman basketball roared over the Rhode Island frosh, 94-86, in a record setting performance. A long standing team record held by the 1964-65 freshman unit, which averaged 87.0 points/game, was smashed easily as the present frosh, which needed just 93 points in two games, scored 94 with still a game to go. The little Redmen have been averaging a sensational 93 pts/g, while limiting their victims to 72.8 pts/g.

The frosh took control right from the start amassing an early 16-7 lead, with Mike Flanagan suppling the early firepower; but the tough Rams forged back, behind the New Jersey boys, 6'3 Randy Hughes and 6'6 Jerry Minetti, to creep within four at the half. The little Redmen had some trouble guarding the taller Rams, allowing them to stay close, but not take the lead.

In the second stanza, after a slow start, the frosh cagers pulled away to a nine point lead behind the leadership of sharpshooter, Bill Endicott. The defensive ability of the Redmen shone through in the second half, as the taller Rams were denied the chance to close the scoring gap. Dave Dibble, once again came through in the clutch, replacing John Murphy, who was in foul trouble, and aided the cause by chipping in with 3 buckets and a fine defensive effort.

This rematch of next year's varsity Yankee Conference foes, was a very rough and tightly contested battle, but the dribblers coolly continued to retain the edge which they never relinquished. Fouls, added to the woes of both coaches, but Rhody was especially hard hit as four of five of their starters fouled out, as compared to only two, John Murphy and Jim Burke for UMass. The Rhody frosh have a tendency to leave the game early, as can be seen by the fact that Bill Bird, Hughes and Minetti fouled out both times they have faced the hoopsters.

Balanced scoring and rebounding, which has become the trademark of the frosh, once again prevailed. All five starters hit double figures, while, four had either six or seven rebounds. Endicott led all scorers, canning 24 points, followed by Tom Gillams and Flanagan, with 18 apiece. Burke's 16 and Murphy's 12 rounded out the scoring of the starting five. Minetti, with 21, and Hughes, with 20, led the Rams' charge. The frosh hit a phenomenal 56% of their field goal attempts, and startingly enough, canned 30-33 charity hoops.

So, the devastation of the opposition continues as the high flying little Redmen travel to Brown to take on another talented Rhode Island based team, on Saturday, in quest of the elusive "undefeated season".

Nicklaus Is Tourney Favorite

MIAMI AP-Jack Nicklaus, primed and ready to take over Arnold Palmer's spot as golf's all-time leading money winner, loomed as the man to beat in the $150,000 Doral-Eastern Open, beginning Thursday.

The 32-year-old Nicklaus, now in his 11th year on the pro tour, pushed his career total to $1,447,079.86 with his second place finish in Jackie Gleason's Inverrarry Classic last week and now is within one big step of overtaking Palmer.

The Golden Bear must win to do it.

He trails Palmer by $24,185.97 on the all-time list. First prize here is $30,000.

And Palmer, stung by one of his poorest performances in recent years, is taking the week off.

Palmer, 10 years older than Nicklaus and now in his 18th professional season, won only $400 last week and beat only one man in the field with finishing rounds of 80 and 79. The 80 was his highest score in almost three years.

Leaman Hopes For Rhody Help

By EARLE BARROLL

Dave Pemberton of New Hampshire was terrible when the Wildcats played the Redmen at the Cage a couple of weeks back. Peter Gavitt of Maine was likewise just as bad when the Black Bears were smothered at the Cage last week.

But this has been the trend of the Yankee Conference this season. No team and no individual has been able to master any form of coherent play on the road.

However, if the UMass basketball team is to have any chance of catching Rhode Island for a fifth consecutive Conference Championship, the two players mentioned above and their teammates are going to have to change the course of history.

That's what Jack Leaman was hoping at yesterday's Varsity M Club luncheon, a day after his team lost the lead to Rhody on a "normal night" on the road.

"We're in trouble with Rhode Island at home against New Hampshire and Maine," he said. "Twice this season we let them back into the race and maybe they'll be kind to us and return the favor we gave them."

If not, "This will be the first time in five years that I won't be able to put a plaque on the wall in my office," Leaman said. "I've been making room for it all season and I just may have to put a picture of Jim Mulcahy (Varsity M Club President) up in its place."

Leaman is pretty amazed at how well his team has played at home and how poorly they've played on the road. "It must be a mental situation," he hypothesized. "We just can't generate any movement on the road. It's really something that we can score over a 100 points at the Cage which everyone is trying to tear down and yet not be able to score 60 points in the new gyms we play in on the road."

As for the Rhody game itself, Leaman felt the turning point was when Al Skinner fouled out two minutes into the second half. In the first half Al had 15 points and his board work was exceptional against the big Ram front line. And without him, "We lost what offense we had up front all night," Leaman noted.

Optimistically Leaman said, "I don't think they're (URI) a team that can't be beaten. I'm just hoping that Pemberton and Gavitt have big games."

He also cited the UNH travesty as the big game that led to Rhode Island's taking over the league lead. "Rhode Island was coming off two big 40-point losses to us and Temple when we went up to play UNH," he said. "Their next game was at UConn and I was looking for them to have a let down there.

"But as soon as we lost to UNH (on a Thursday) it gave them the incentive to play well at Storrs on Saturday."

Leaman brought his two "body guards" with him, centers Charlie Peters and Tom Austin...two completely different ball players, but Leaman just may have the solution to finding the complete center: "I have too find a machine and put these two in, scramble them up and hope that either Peters' body comes out with the speed and agility of Austin or Austin's body comes out with Peters' aggression."

VOLUME XCIX, ISSUE 101 UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS FRIDAY, MARCH 3, 1972

Fac-Sen OK's Teacher Evaluation Comm.

By JIM DEMPSEY

A motion from Vice Chancellor Robert Gluckstern, establishing an Ad Hoc Committee on Teaching Evaluation and Improvement, was passed yesterday by the Facutly-Senate.

In their Thursday afternoon session, the Senate also endorsed a motion strongly urging the Governor, the State Legislature and the University Administration to maintain tuition at its present $200 annual level for in-state undergraduate students, and heard a program report from the Chancellor Search Committee.

The Ad Hoc Committee would serve as an advisory body for the Provost's Office on matters of teaching improvement, reporting their findings four times each year. It would also develop plans for administering student questionnaires for the evaluation of University teaching and establish criteria for judging the results of such polls.

Professor Solomon Barkin proposed an amendment to this motion to eliminate the evaluation aspect and focus more attention on teaching improvements. "Until we work to improve teaching here, evaluation wouldn't be useful," Barkin complained.

His amendment would work to rechannel evaluation time, money, and energy. Citing the "brash, immature evaluation proceduress" of the past, Barkin noted the need for either new methods or none at all. The statistical department was named as the major beneficiary of an evaluation. It would annually provide statistical students the opportunity to improve their proficiency in this area--as did last year's publication.

Barkin's feeling was that responses to previous questionnaires have not been self-generated by the students. Their opinions have been influenced by the views of others, such as the campus leaders and University officials.

Senator Ellen Gerber, arguing against Professor Barkin's statements, thought the proposal was valid, if only for the fact that it was establishing an office "to do the job right." Last year, the task was a rather haphazard affair, involving a certain amount of injustice, according to Gerber.

Professor Zina Tillona added her support, welcoming the idea of a specific office to organize and operate evaluation procedures. She firmly believes in student questionnaires, but strongly disapproves of "bad" questionnaires.

Professor Terence Burke urged the Faculty Senate to accept such an ongoing evaluation, assuring those faculty members who felt threatened by the proposal, that it would 1) leave its initiation at the faculty level; 2) provide for administration of procedures by the Committee; 3) provide for this Committee to be responsible to the Senate on these matters.

Professor Barkin's statement was defeated and Vice Chancellor Gluckstern's original motion was passed.

The Senate endorsed another motion, that will be presented to the Massachusetts Legislature on Tuesday--urging the Commonwealth's top officials to retain the current $200 per year tuition fee for in-state undergraduate students.

This also provides for the assignment of all fees collected from Out-of-State students to be assigned to a trust fund for scholarship aid. This would benefit students attending public institutions in Massachusetts.

Chairman of the Chancellor Search Committee, Professor Harold Gordon informed the Senate that of an original 80 candidates for the Chancellor's post here in Amherst, there are seven nominees remaining. The Screening Process was completed by several subcommittees. With the deadline three weeks away, meetings with the nominees have been scheduled. The seven, from various colleges across the nation, have been invited to visit the campus. One candidate was in town yesterday.

Professor Warren Litsky issued a vibrant "Hallelujah", as two years of debate and lengthy discussion came to an end. The name of the Department of Environmental Sciences was for-

Quinn Says Budget Cuts Unjustified; Consumerism Growing

By MARK VOGLER

Massachusetts Atty. Gen. Robert H. Quinn told a crowd of 200 in the Student Union Ballroom last night that consumer protection has made significant strides in the past, but still has a long way to go.

"Consumerism is not a fad," Quinn said to his audience. "It's not a campus craze that will be in here one eyar and out the next. We can't rely on government alone to do the job, we need the help of volunteering groups from all over."

In reply to the inquiry of whether or not Quinn endorsed Gov. Francis Sargent's recommendation that UMass' requested budget be cut by 20% and if the Governor was justified, Quinn answered: "I think that he was less justified in cutting back the Belchertown budget requests to 40%. But I don't think that he was justified in either case.

Quinn proudly asserted: "There was a time when a fellow by the name of Quinn was Speaker of the House in Massachusetts. And UMass didn't have any budget cuts then, whether the Governor wanted them or not."

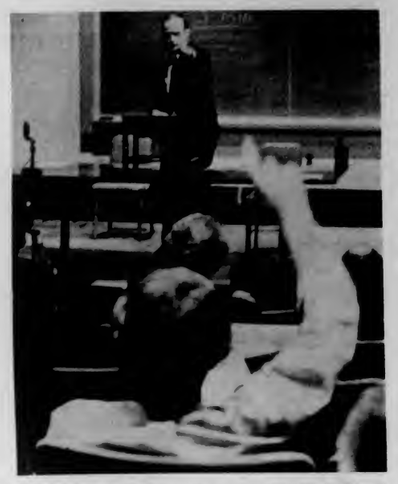
Quinn, who made the statement the previous night that "students of the University of Massachusetts are, by and large, apathetic and unconcerned" about the future of Massachusetts state government, made a slight reference to his point to open his speech.

As he put it very bluntly: "Thank you for your more than apathetic applause. Judging from the size of the Student Union Ballroom, you don't seem to constitute a very large audience."

Quinn said that the office of Attorney General was threefold in nature. "It's a job of chief law enforcement officer of the Commonwealth, one as lawyer for the government as representing the apex of legal argument since most of the important issues must be resolved in high court, and finally one of being a lawyer for the people-- the government should and does have an obligation to take a solid stance on behalf of the people", the attorney general stated.

Quinn pointed out that there has been a change of attitude in the government in regard to the consumer. "The job of our office becomes more and more challenging all the time. My office receives 300 complaints a day in regard to consumer protection. It becomes so crowded that you don't know whether you're in a suburb or an office," he said.

"But it's going to need the cooperation of every citizen. We're not out to intimidate the businessman or landlord, for good practices on his part will help him out. If you keep your customer happy, naturally he'll keep coming back," the attorney general said.



In what appeared to be a very vague and dull speech on the topic of consumerisn, was brought to life with a hot and heavy question and answer period which featured an extensive dialogue between Quinn and S.O.S. chairman Joe Sylvia.

Mentioning a hearing that took place in the Attorney General's office in the morning concerning Belchertown, Sylvia asked why the constitutional rights for treatment cannot be predicated on a system of voluntary admission.

mally changed to the Department of Agricultural and Environmental Microbiology, later in the meeting.

Doctor Thomas Lessie strongly opposed this motion, arguing that the creation of a second microbiology department on campus would be seriously confusing.

The motion was passed in view of the fact that the Committee on Academic Matters had deliberated on this issue for two years.

A different version of a motion by Professor Joseph Burroughs concerning the Doctor Freida Salzman case was tabled. Basically it would provide for a hearing of the Salzman case. The Senate body requested it be tabled until a thorough study of the important related documents could be conducted.

Atty. General Quinn

Quinn denied any accusation of the sort and replied: "I and my staff are very committed to the constitutional rights of those committed voluntarily or otherwise. I don't believe that anybody in my office released such a statement. It happened on the best information that you have which is second hand. To the best of my knowledge, it didn't happen. All I can say is that if I'm not doing my job, then I don't deserve to hold office."

The S.O.S. chairman kept firing questions at the Attorney General, and Quinn tried to shake them off until finally he asked Sylvia: "Are you a prodige of Richard Howland? Because if you're not, you're doing a very good job."

Quinn was asked how he contemplated running for governor. His response: Today I want to be the best possible attorney general that I know how, and I think that 1974 will take care of itself."

Grass Drivers Are Better

PROVIDENCE (AP) — A forthcoming federal study indicates that persons who drive autos under the influence of marijuana are more cautious and less aggressive than drivers under the influence of alcohol, according to the director of the Injury Control Research Laboratory here.

Dr. Robert McKelvey, says further tests are planned to determine the vigilance of marijuana smokers over a 3 to 4 hour period behind the wheel of an auto simulator machine.

McKelvey says the tests, completed last June after a 10-month study, do not mean that persons under the influence of marijuana are safer drivers than persons drinking alcohol. "It's quite possible that they are not as alert," he said Tuesday.

Complete findings of the study will be released for publication in a few weeks, after policy clearance by the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare under which the research lab operates.

Bromery Meets With SUG Board

By CHARLEY BERKOW

Acting Chancellor Randolph Bromery indicated last night that he would be in favor of setting up meetings with representatives of the Student Union Governing Board to work out guidelines for the use of his veto power over SUG Board decisions.

Bromery spoke to and answered questions from SUG Board members for about 45 minutes last night, most of that time spent during open meeting.

Bromery appeared at the SUG Board meeting to discuss his veto power over the board's decisions.

In recent weeks, Bromery has vetoed several amendments to the SUG Board constitution.

Bromery said that he would like some type of constitutional amendment which would allow him to return SUG Board decisions to the board for reconsideration.

In response to a question on whether or not it would be possible to make a provision for some type of override to the Chancellor's veto over SUG Board actions, Bromery said that it is the Chancellor's responsibility to the Board of Trustees to exercise his veto when necessary.

He said that he would not approve of his veto being restricted to matters of fiscal responsibility, but added that the veto should be used only when there would be major repercussions on policy issues.

Barry Cohen, Chairperson of SUG Board, said later, "I don't think that much can be done in a full meeting." He said that the major result of the meeting was to let Bromery know what SUG Board members were thinking and feeling, and to let the members get to know Bromery. Cohen felt that most of this was accomplished during the question and answer period.

In other business, the board agreed to budget about over $200 for telephones near the scheduling office. It also discussed and enacted several by-laws. Principle among these was one to set the quorum for standing SUG Board committees at 50% plus 1.

2001 Came Early This Year

CAPE KENNEDY, Fla. (AP) — Bearing a message for alien civilizations, America's Pioneer 10 rocketed away from earth Thursday night to start the longest space flight ever attempted--a 21-month odyssey to giant, baffling Jupiter and eventual escape to travel forever through distant galaxies.

A 13-story tall, Atlas-Centaur rocket flashed brilliantly in the night sky as it burst away from its launch pad at 8:49 p.m. EST to thrust the payload away from its home planet. The shot had been postponed three times this week by strong high altitude winds.

The three-stage rocket was to accelerate the spacecraft to more than 31,000 miles an hour, nearly 7,000 miles faster than any previous space vehicle.

"All systems look good. We're proceeding on the normal program," the launch control center reported as the rocket rose toward space.

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration said it expected to know about an hour after liftoff whether Pioneer 10 was on the proper course to Jupiter, largest planet in the solar system.

If all goes as planned, Pioneer 10 will set many space records.

It will be the fastest manmade object in space. It will be the first to penetrate the asteroid belt, the first to explore Jupiter and the first to leave our solar system. It will relay radio data from a record distance.

Unless it crashes into a space body or is captured by outer space beings, scientists say it will wander for eternity through other star systems, streaking even farther from Earth.

On the remote chance it might one day be intercepted by intelligent creatures of any other civilization, it bears a gold plaque that tells in drawings and scientific symbols when and from where it was launched and by what kind of people. Included are the figures of a nude man and woman, the man's right hand raised in friendly gesture.

Four months into the flight, the 565-pound payload, which is powered by four nuclear batteries, is to fly into the asteroid belt which is composed of billions of pieces of debris that orbit the Sun at distances from 170 million to 345 million miles. They range from dust-size to a 480-mile-diameter rock named Ceres.

The probe is to reach the vicinity of Jupiter on Dec. 2, 1973. As it skims to within 87,000 miles during a four-day pass, 13 instruments are to probe many secrets of this massive body, most of which are concealed beneath dense, swirling clouds which form pink and blue bands to give it the appearance of a brightly-colored beach ball.

Scientists aren't even sure Jupiter has a surface. Some feel that because of its high gravity, it may go from a thick, gaseous atmosphere, down to oceans of liquid hydrogen, to a slushy layer and then to a solid hydrogen core.

It has more than twice the mass of all the other planets combined, and it has violent, dynamic internal processes. Pioneer 10's chemical analysis might shed some light on a theory that Jupiter may be in a stage paralleling an early phase of Earth's-the stage when life began to appear.

In 11 or 12 years after launch, the craft would become the first manmade device to escape the solar system after it passes beyond the orbit of Pluto. NASA hopes it will continue sending radio data on interstellar space for five or six years after it leaves Jupiter.

Concert Comm. To Support S.O.S.

The Concert Committee proposed and unanimously supported a bill last night which called for a "benefit concert" with the Committee members "promising to collect funds for S.O.S. (Students Offering Support)."

Tri-chairman Eliot Sherman expressed hopes that this proposal would replace a bill now before the Student Senate to transfer $8,112 for the Spring Concert to S.O.S. It, however, the original bill is passed next Wednesday night, the Concert Committee will call for a student referendum.

The Southwest Assembly has transferred $500 to the Concert Committee, bringing the total amount allocated to $8,621. The expected budget is $12,000.

Sherman believes that transferring the concert money to S.O.S. is an "injustice to the students." He stated, "It is morally right and good to try to clean up society, but there is no end to the cleaning up that should be done. Students pay an activity tax to be used for their own benefit and this can best be accomplished here on the UMass campus."

Students For McGovern Urged To Campaign In N.H.

The UMass Students for McGovern held their weekly meeting on Wednesday night in the Campus Center. UMass coordinator Reid Fishman called upon the members of the group to go to New Hampshire to canvas again this weekend. He stressed a need for people to get to the Salem area to bring out support for the senator.

Ken Mousakowski, Western Mass. Student Coordinator, told members that because of the recent drop of popularity of Senator Muskie this is the time to bring McGovern's stand to the people. He related stories of how Muskie canvassers have had doors slammed in their faces recently--this he said is because of New Hampshire voters' negative reaction to Muskie's emotional outburst on Saturday.

After Ken spoke, Reid introduced Javien Brey, who is in the United States to work on an experimental educational program. Mr. Brey hopes the program will design, deliver, and evaluate the training of volunteers engaged in the Massachusetts presidential primary campaign. He explained that most volunteers do not know their work and vote directly helps give their candidate the party's nomination. This is the first time a training program of this type is being offered. A similar program was done in 1968 in Minnesota working with Gene McCarthy's volunteers. That program did not use part-time volunteers but the full-time workers found it very successful.

Next to speak was Mary Lavin of the Student Mobilization Committee who talked about the National Student Anti-War Conference held February 25-27 in New York City. Twenty people from UMass attended the conference. Mr. Fishman then spoke about the March 8 Women's International Day March. He asked for a show of support for the March and the vote was unanimously in favor. He reminded the group that the next meeting will be held on March 8 at 8 p.m. in Room 917 of the Campus Center and that all are invited.

Rents And Fees, You Pay

By MICHAEL GREGORY

The Rents and Fees Committee of the Student Senate is conducting a drive for student support of their efforts to try and stop fee increases next fall. Unfortunately, not many students understand the severity of the situation.

All indications right now point to an increase in room, health, Campus Center, and telephone fees along with possible increases in board. For example, the 95% projection of room occupancy has not been realized this year and it is doubtful it will be obtained next year. This means that those who do live in dormitories will have to foot the bill for those who don't.

Recent increases in the rates for telephone service will leave the University about $40,000 in debt at the end of this academic year. When the issue of the Campus Center funding was discussed a few years ago, the fee was expected to rise from $60 to $90 over a four-year span.

Judging from the response of the students so far, it appears that the committee's feelings are not the feelings of the students on this issue. After four days of campaigning only 3,500 signatures have been received. Despite the poor showing to date, it is the hope of the committee that more students will act soon.

The committee recognizes the reasons for the increases, especially those for housing but they are seeking alternative ways of raising money beside student fees. Combining these possible increases with a possible increase in tuition, the committee feels an excessive burden is being put on the student.

The time to act and have any effect is upon students now. If no action is taken until the fees come before the Trustees, there is very little that can be done. So, if you have any sympathy with the committee actions, please stop by their table in the concourse level of the Campus Center tomorrow and sign the letter to Whitmore. Next fall is too late to complain.

School Of Education "Meeting Of The Minds"

The first "meeting of the minds" of all interested in a general rap session will take place this Friday evening at 7 p.m. in the School of Education Faculty Lounge. Brother Russel, a graduate student in Mass Media, will preside over the session which is to be videotaped for possible incorporation into the first Television Special Productions.

The goal before the minds involved is to "present contemporary life as it really is." John Langworthy, sponsoring the project, in an interview, enthusiastically described Brother Russel as "an up-and-coming film producer comparable to Mayer and Goldwyn in their early years." He stressed that all types of people with all types of talent are welcomed, for assistants are needed in every capacity: script writing, camera, scenes, and acting.

The use of the facilities of a Holyoke television station has been set up, and all that is now required is the real participation of people to produce neo-modern entertainment. When the films have been produced and distributed, profits are anticipated on a consignment basis upon the success of the endeavor

Students Study Nuclear Site

The site of a nuclear power plant in Vernon, Vermont, will be the object of close scrutiny by a group of UMass students on Saturday, March 4th.

Polly Plimpton, a trustee of the New England Coalition on Nuclear Pollution, explained that the Vernon plant is an object of concern due to its possible effect on the environment. The nuclear reactor is located 28 miles from the Amherst area.

The students plan to study such problems as the daily release of low-level radioactive gasses into the air; the storage and disposal of high-level radioactive wastes; and the possibility of serious accident within the plant.

Ombudsman Search Opened

By LAURA DUBOWSKI

An eight-member search committee, comprised of both faculty and students, is accepting applications for the position of University Ombudsman.

The position is open due to the retirement (on June 1, 1972) of the present Ombudsman, Dr. Ellsworth Barnerd.

Four faculty members, one graduate student, and three undergraduates for the council are seeking the new campus Ombudsman. It is their wish to change the existing requirements for the post of Ombudsman. As it stands now, a Board of Trustees' meeting decided on October 18, 1969, that the candidate for the office must be a UMass faculty member. He will obtain released time from his duties, and if necessary, also receive the help of a student co-Ombudsman. Both are salaried positions.

The committee desires to return to the original Adhoc decision that was to open the office to either faculty, students (both grad and undergrad), administrators, or to non-community people considered as educators. (Although the Adhoc decision was the first to be approved, it was later altered by the Board of Trustees.)

In acting towards this objective, the staff will send a letter through Acting Chancellor Bromery to President Wood requesting support for the change.

With this in mind, the committee will accept all applications from interested faculty, students, administrators, and non-UMass educators. The deadline for filing applications is March 18, 1972, and they may be submitted to any of the search committee members. They are Dean Field, Harvey Friedman, Labor Relations Professor, Betty Mitchell, grad student, or Bert Emmons, Paul Hamel, and Pat Suprenaut, undergraduates.

One of the main functions of the Office of Ombudsman is to aid in the settlement of grievances. Ombudsman are appointed for a two-year term, and they are unable to serve more than two consecutive years.

Due to the increased number of applications being processed for the fall semester, staff limitations, and the extra burden imposed by a quota system, the Graduate School has found it necessary to close the Graduate Admissions Office one day a week. Effective February 25, the Graduate Admissions Office will be closed for business on all Fridays through April 14. Telephone inquiries and requests for admissions materials will be handled on those days by the receptionist in the second floor lobby of the Graduate Research Center.

Kleindienst Denys Anti-Trust Charge

WASHINGTON (AP) — Acting Atty. Gen. Richard G. Kleindienst denied vehemently Thursday that the settlement of an antitrust suit against International Telephone and Telegraph Corp. was based on political considerations.

Kleindienst also told the Senate Judiciary Committee he did not know of reports that ITT committed $400,000 to the 1972 Republican National Convention until six months after the antitrust settlement was made.

"I would like to say categorically and specifically that not until December 1971 did I have any knowledge, direct or indirect, that ITT was being asked to make a contribution for the Republican National Convention," he testified.

At the luncheon recess, committee chairman James O. Eastland, D-Miss., said when asked for comment on Kleindienst's testimony: "He's guilty of nothing."

Former Atty. Gen. Mitchell, whom Kleindienst was nominated to succeed, is scheduled to testify Friday.

The Senate is still to act on Kleindienst's nomination, which has been approved by the Judiciary Committee. Kleindienst asked that the judiciary hearings be reopened for testimony about the ITT case.

Kleindienst has been accused by columnist Jack Anderson of participating in negotiations to settle the ITT case during secret meetings with Wall Street financier and ITT director Felix Rohatyn.

Anderson has alleged that the administration agreed to a compromise settlement of federal antitrust charges against ITT in exchange for a $400,00 contribution to defray costs of the GOP convention next summer.

Anderson cited a confidential memo from ITT's chief Washington lobbyist, Mrs. Dita B. Beard to W.R. Merriam, head of ITT's Washington office. It is quoted as saying, in part: "Mitchell is definitely helping us but cannot let it be known."

Mrs. Beard was subpoenaed to testify, Sen. Eastland said, but she had not been located.

Kleindienst, U.S. District Court Judge Richard W. McLaren, then an assistant attorney general for antitrust matters, and Rohatyn appeared together as witnesses.

Each denied knowledge of the ITT commitment to San Diego until after the settlement was completed last July 31.

The out-of-court settlement terminated suits in which the Justice department challenged several ITT acquisitions, including Hartford Fire Insurance Co.

The 48-year-old Kleindienst, then deputy attorney general, said he acted for Mitchell in the case because the former attorney general's law firm had been involved in litigation for ITT.

In replying to questions by Sen. Phillip A. Hart, D-Mich., Rohatyn described Kleindienst as a "passive participant" in meetings held with Justice Department lawyers.

Asked about Mrs. Beard's memo, Kleindienst replied "categorically, no" to having knowledge of her conversations with Mitchell.

In Brief...

French Heroin Bust

MARSEILLE, France (AP)-French customs agents made the world's largest recorded seizure of pure heroin Thursday-425 kilos, or 937 pounds, concealed in the bilges of a Caribbean shrimp boat.

In Washington, U.S. Treasury officials said the cache would be worth $200 million to $450 million on the streets of New York depending on how much it was cut with other substances. They said 100-milligram doses with 5 per cent heroin would bring $450 million.

Peking-Taipei Ties Revealed

PARIS (AP) — Andre Malraux said today there has been a long-standing agreement between Peking and Taipei that Taiwan will come under Communist Chinese control after the death of Chiang Kai-shek.

Malraux, French intellectual and specialist on Communist China, made a special trip to Washington last month to talk to President Nixon in advance of the President's trip to Peking.

When asked during an interview with the French news agency, AFP, if he had been surprised by the Chinese-- American communique summing up the bilateral talks, or of concessions by President Nixon on Taiwan, Malraux replied:

"I was not, since Nixon was not...I do not think that Nixon gave up anything on Taiwan because there has been between Peking and Taipei, an agreement for at least five years linked to the death of Chiang Kai-shek. But they did not think Chiang Kai-shek would live so long.

"I am convinced of the existence of this agreement under which Nationalist China will again become Chinese when Chiang Kai-shek dies. The form of this transformation will certainly be subtle. But we can count on the Chinese for subtlety. I told Nixon this.

"Fundamentally, the Americans had a fixed idea on this. Good. Let's not get excited about this. It is subtle. They know that they will not fight for Taiwan and the Chinese know it too. To what extent is Taiwan an aircraft carrier for the Americans? Apparently, in the long run, Taiwan is no longer an aircraft carrier. With this said, what importance has the rest?"

Berrigan Praises FBI Informer

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP) — Philip Berrigan was quoted Thursday as praising informer Boyd Douglas' devotion to the antiwar Catholic left, some 10 weeks after the latter had secretly betrayed him to the FBI.

"Our charge emerges in truly outstanding fashion," the Rev. Berrigan allegedly wrote Sister Elizabeth McAlister in a letter read into the record at the federal conspiracy trial of the priest, the nun and five others.

"The value and concerns that occupy us are beginning to consume him," the 48-year-old priest went on. "He's thinking movement. Mark my words he will be one of our best people."

Douglas, 31, testified that he was referred to as the "charge d'affaires" by the defendants. The seven are accused of plotting to kidnap presidential aide Henry A. Kissinger, blow up heating tunnels under Washington, D.C., and vandalize draft centers.

A fellow convict with Berrigan in the Lewisburg, Pa., federal penitentiary in the spring of 1970, Douglas said he defected to the FBI in the course of smuggling mail in and out of the penitentiary for the priest. More than a score of these letters have been identified by Douglas and read into the court record in the last three days.

Douglas testified that after his defection he remained known to the unsuspecting associates of Berrigan as 'Phil's friend inside the penitentiary."

Referring to three of Berrigan's codefendants, including a husband and wife who are an ex-priest and former nun, Douglas testified: "Anthony Scoblick told me that Joseph Wenderoth has been in contact with him concerning the destruction of the tunnel system. He told me Joseph Wenderoth told him I would be in charge of the explosive...

"Mary Scoblick said to me, 'I'm glad we have someone who knows the use of explosives so we won't blow ourselves up'."

Draft Resisters Morality Questioned

WASHINGTON (AP)-The Pentagon has told a Senate panel studying possible amnesty for Vietnam draft resisters and deserters that only a tiny percentage of those who desert each year are prompted by moral objections to the war.

A law professor, disagreeing in part, says the deserters he interviewed overseas had to a large extent become disillusioned over the contrast between what they had been told about the war and what they saw with their own eyes.

Pentagon and Justice Department officials told Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's Judiciary subcommittee Wednesday there are now more than 50,000 deserters and alleged violators of Selective Service law.

Maj. Gen. Lee Benade, assistant secretary of Defense for personnel, said, however, that of the 30,000 men listed as deserters, only 2,323 have fled to foreign countries. And, only 4.1 per cent of those are believed to have been prompted by political or antiwar feelings.

A Justice Department spokesman said a large number-up to 80 percent-of those refusing induction later have a change of heart and voluntarily submit to the draft, an act which washes out criminal action against them.

Dr. Joseph L. Sax, law professor at the University of Michigan, testified that he was surprised to learn how many deserters had not been opposed to American policy on entering the Army, reflecting instead on conventional acceptance of the war.

But he said answers to the question, "Why did you desert?" frequently emphasized "the sharp difference between what the man had heard and what he saw with his own eyes after he was exposed to the reality of war."

Extension of general amnesty, especially to deserters, was opposed by the Pentagon, and by John H. Geiger, national commander of the American Legion.

Castro Warms To U.S.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Cuban Prime Minister Fidel Castro is telling intimates he no longer is opposed inflexibly to resuming a more friendly relationship with the United States.

Diplomats attuned to Castro's thinking say there has been a decided change in his views since last September, when he declared that Cuba has "no intention or desire of resuming relations with Yankee imperialism."

The first evidence of the emergence of a "new Castro" came in Chile last Nov. 25 when he declared that an era of U.S.-Cuban friendship might be possible after the Nixon administration leaves office.

In private conversations, Castro has made it known that the statement was no slip of the tongue. One diplomat, who asked not to be quoted by name, spent 45 minutes with Castro not long ago and said Castro's position toward a dialogue with the United States is unmistakably more flexible than it was just a few months ago.

Another Castro expert who has detected a change in the prime minister's attitude is Prof. James D. Theberge, director of Latin-American studies for the Center for Strategic and International Studies of Georgetown University.

Theberge said he has received information indicating that Castro is "astoundingly well informed" about the position of a number of U.S. newspapers and editorial writers on U.S.-Cuban relations.

In an interview, Theberge said that Castro's concern over the viewpoint of U.S. opinion makers could be aimed at giving him a "feel of the possibilities of resuming a dialogue."

—Theberge said Castro's apparent reappraisal of his hardline anti-American stand stems primarily from a desire to free Cuba from what has become an almost total dependence on the Soviet Union.

In the economic sphere, Theberge said, the Kremlin is demanding more and more say on how Soviet economic resources are to be used in Cuba. He said Castro might find the Soviet presence more tolerable if Cuba showed some signs of economic progress. In Cuba, even sugar is rationed.

U.S. officials say Castro has given them no direct signal of a desire for resuming a dialogue and there is some questions whether the Nixon administration would agree to talks prior to the November elections.

Nixon administration political strategists, recognizing the anti-Castro sentiment among Cuban refugees remains strong, says that a show of flexibility toward Castro before November could cost the Republicans thousands of votes.

According to Theberge, another of the reasons for Castro's apparent policy switch is that he is obsessed with the fear that the Moscow summit meeting could produce a U.S.-Soviet understanding at the expense of Cuba's security interests.

Syria Expells Israeli Warplanes

BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Israeli warplanes attempted to enter Syrian air space over the Mediterranean port city of Latakia Thursday but were driven off, a Syrian military communique claimed.

"Our planes and antiaircraft batteries intercepted the enemy planes and forced them to flee," said the communique broadcast over Damascus radio.

Military sources in Lebanon reported earlier in the day that five Israeli Skyhawk jets flew over the southern Lebanese town of Marj'Uyun, apparently headed for Syria. The sources said the planes circled low over the village on their return from Syria.

The Israeli military command refused to confirm or deny reports of the flight. Military spokesmen in Tel Aviv said no military or guerrilla activity was reported on the Lebanese or Syrian frontiers.

Israel and Syria exchanged fire Wednesday, as Israel continued its campaign against guerrillas in Arab territory and Syria retaliated with raids onsettlements in the occupied Gowlan Heights.

It marked Syria's first air strike against Israel since June 1970 and Syria vowed Thursday to retaliate against any future Israeli raids.

Syria has officially rejected a peaceful settlement of the Middle East conflict but until now has tacitly observed the 19-month old Arab-Israeli cease-fire.

Troops Find Bomb In N. Ireland

BELFAST (AP) — Northern Ireland's biggest terrorist bomb so far--300 pounds of gelignite packed inside a stolen auto--was exploded by British troops Thursday as new blasts rocked the bloodstained province and a soldier was gunned down.

Bomb disposal experts abandoned attempts to defuse the huge booby trap charge planted outside a gasoline station at Newry near Northern Ireland's border with Ireland. Troops cordoned off the area and the detonation wrecked the gas station.

The bomb was found as a British government inquiry in London urged stricter control over the interrogation methods used by security forces on terrorist suspects. Prime Minister Edward Heath immediately banned tough interrogation methods.

A tribunal probing the hooting of 13 Roman Catholics in Londonderry's "Bloody Sunday" heard a scientist testify that paraffin tests showed six of the dead had been using guns when civil rights demonstrators and British paratroops clashed.

London sources said that Britain's conservative government still is not ready to launch an expected political initiative to defuse the crisis in Northern Ireland, where the outlawed Irish Republican Army is waging a guerrilla war against 15,000 British troops.

The soldier shot was hit when terrorists fired from Ireland at a border patrol near Clady in County Londonderry. The army said he was not seriously hurt.

The deaths early Thursday of two Belfast youths--believed killed in a shoothout between guerrillas and troops and police in the capital--raised the province's death toll to 257 in 31 months of sectarian bloodshed.

Russia To Aid Bangladesh

MOSCOW (AP) — Sheik Mujibur Rahman signed an agreement with Kremlin leaders Thursday to release $42.2 million in Soviet aid to the impoverished nation, Bangladesh sources said.

It was the first concrete public result of talks the Bangladesh prime minister has had with Soviet officials since arriving Wednesday to seek massive economic aid.

The sources said the funds had been set aside for projects in former East Pakistan, now Bangladesh, under economic and technical assistance agreements the Soviet Union had made over the years with Pakistan.

They said the funds were unofficially forzen just before the India-Pakistan war in December, which created Bangladesh.

The funds are for such projects as a thermal power plan, an electrical manufacturing plant, oil and gas exploration and radio equipment.

The Bangladesh sources said another agreement has been drafted for technical, industrial and other kinds of assistance to the war-torn nation.

The second agreement is to be initialled before Mujib ends his visit to the Soviet Union on Monday.

Committee Favors Lower Drinking Age

The Legislature's Committee on Government Regulations gave a favorable nod yesterday to proposed legislation to lower the drinking age in Massachusetts from 21to 18, after three hours of testimony overwhelmingly in favor of changing the statute.

Also winning approval was legislation to lower the legal age for the sale and purchase of alcoholic beverages to 18-year-olds and permit them to be employed on premises where alcoholic beverages are sold.

The legislation, passed last year in the House but killed in the Senate, would open hundreds of jobs to teenagers, particularly in the summer.

Yesterday's hearing, attended by 80 teenagers, was in sharp contrast the a year ago when former Registrar of Motor Vehicles Richard McLaughlin, now secretary of public saftey, personnally pleaded against the measure.

Neither he nor present Registrar David Lucey turned up to testify. They were represented by Joseph Walsh, who opposed the lowering of the drinking age, noting that alcohol is involved in many accidents. He said the officials do not oppose 18-year-olds working where liquor is served or sold.

Rep. Robert Ambler (D-Weymouth), chairman, said the bills will be introduced to the Senate. Last year the committee approved a bill to reducing the age to 19. The House amended this to 18, and the measure was killed in the Senate.

Arlene Boyce, 20, of Peabody, a waitress, said it is difficult for minors to get well-paying waitress jobs because the law does not allow them to serve drinks.

"We have to share our tips with older waitresses who serve our customers drinks," she said.

Reversing himself, Rep. William F. Hogan (D-Everett), who opposed lowering the drinking age last year, supported the 18-year-old bill because "youngsters have become adults by legislation and should be made responsible for their acts."

Rep. William W. MacLean Jr. (D-Fairhaven), who as last year's committee chairman pushed for the 19-year-old measure and now Democratic whip, also favors this year's bill.

"It amazes me that people are worried about kids having a drink while they can buy dope on any corner..." he said, noting he first sipped beer at home when he was 15.

McGovern Forecasts "Cliffhanger"

DURHAM, N.H. (AP)- Sen. George McGovern is forecasting a cliffhanging finish in the New Hampshire presidential primary as he and Sen. Edmund S. Muskie begin their final drives for votes in the March 7 balloting.

Muskie and McGovern, virtually certain to be the one-two finishers in the Democratic race, both planned five days of New Hampshire campaigning until election eve.

"A small number of votes one way or the other can decide this election," McGovern said Wednesday night in asking some 800 University of New Hampshire students for support.

"I don't think it's going to be at all surprising if this election here turns out to be .. a cliffhanger," the South Dakota senator said.

McGovern's strategists contend that if Muskie's New Hampshire campaign is to be judged a success, the Maine senator should poll substantially more than a majority of the vote, in a race with five names on the Democratic ballot and an active, expensive write-in campaign under way for Rep. Wilbur D. Mills of Arkansas.

It is part of the primary election gamesmanship for a political manager to set the opposition goal high while keeping his own public claims modest and more easily attainable.

But an outcome approaching the kind of cliffhanger McGovern envisioned would be a major and unexpected boost for the underdog entry from South Dakota.

Muskie, speaking at a $500-a-plate fundraising dinner in Boston Wednesday night, said he believed the people of New Hampshire would judge him fairly in the primary and won't head the "veritable drumbeat of venom" from conservative publisher William Loeb.

He made clear that he is ready to return to the attack, if necessary, against Loeb, whose Manchester Union Leader is New Hampshire's largest daily newspaper.

He said the New Hampshire primary is particularly important because "if I can't do well here, the rest of the country ought not to be asked to consider me."

Muskie said he once won an election by one vote, but added, "I haven't been able to persuade the press that that's a sufficient margin. If I don't do so, I may be in trouble next Tuesday."

Mass. Unemployment Jumped 7.5 Per Cent In January

BOSTON (AP)—Unemployment in Massachusetts jumped to 7.5 per cent of the total work force during January, it was reported today by the state Division of Employment Security.

The unemployment rate in December was 6.8 per cent, with 181,500 persons out of work. In January, the division said, some 194,900 persons were out of work.

Adjusted to remove purely seasonal factors, the unemployment rate for Massachusetts in January was 7 per cent, compared to 5.9 per cent nation-wide.

Total employment in the state dropped to 2,408,800 in January, the division said, some 69,400 less than the number reported working in December.

Herman V. LaMark, out-going director of the division, said the last January in which the unemployment rate reached 7.5 per cent was in 1959.

In January, 1971, the division said, the unemployment rate was 6.9 per cent.

The heaviest employment losses this January occurred in non-manufacturing industries, which lost some 52,300 jobs, the division said.

The urban area with the greatest unemployment rate was Lowell, with 11.7 per cent of the job force out of work. Next was the Lawrence-Haverhill area, 10 per cent; New Bedford, 9.7 per cent; Fall River, 9.6 per cent; Brockton, 9 per cent; Springfield-Chicopee-Holyoke, 8.5 per cent; Worcester, 7.4 per cent, and Boston, 5.9 per cent.

Big Brother Is Watching You

NEW YORK (LNS)-"More investigations are in order...for plenty of reasons, chief of which are it will enhance the paranoia endemic in these circles and will further serve to get the point across that there is an FBI agent behind every mailbox. In addition, some will be overcome by the overwhelming personalities of the contacting agent and will volunteer to tell all--perhaps on a continuing basis."

from an internal FBI newsletter called "New Left Notes--Phila." ripped off with the other documents in the spring of 1971 from the FBI office in Media, Pa.

In New York they call themselves the Security and Investigation Section; in other cities they go by the name of the Anti-Subversive Squad, the Intelligence Unit or the Civil Disobedience Unit or other aliases. Most everybody else calls them the Red Squad.

If you've ever been to an demonstration you've seen them there--straight-dressed middle-aged men knowingly eyeing everyone or trading slightly menacing quips with people they've seen before. Then there are their not-so-conspicuous cronies who sometimes manage to look and dress like everyone else or those who carry fake press passes and cameras with a TV station's initials on it.

They exist in some form in every large or medium-sized urban area and form the local links to the high intelligence network that includes 20 federal agencies such as the FBI, Army Intelligence and the Secret Service. The network and the paranoia stalking along with it are growing so rapidly that pretty soon people are going to think that there is an agent behind every mailbox (the Post Office in fact has an intelligence division of its own.)

Recently a group of New York people including three people who were making a film on the Red Squad, Panthers, a lawyer, Abbie Hoffman, members of Computer People for Peace and a member of the Gay Liberation Front filed suit against the N.Y. Red Squad to stop it from further infiltration interrogation electronic surveillance and the use of informers.

While the whole process of filing a suit and going through the clanking legal process is not something that most of the plaintiffs believe in, they initiated the suit to bring the Red Squad, who like to stay out of the spotlight, out in the open.

In recent years, the N.Y. Red Squad (or BOSS--the Bureau of Special Services--as it used to be called) has had quite an active career. According to a number of people who have watched it (and have been watched by it) since the sixties, its tactics since that time have changed. "At the beginning of the Peace movement in 1968, it was the shock troops of the cops." They used karate and brass knuckles and "beat the shit out of people". They would drive down the street and pick a key point in a demonstration, dive in and split the demonstration into smaller parts.

Gradually over the years their tactics have switched to cameras and some of the agents have become almost celebrities. Probably the most famous example is John Finnegan--a slick, silver-haired Red Squad man who has become so prominent at demonstrations that many New Yorkers recognize him and swap comments. Finnegan, when not on official business, can be found moonlighting as a male model. He once appeared in an ad for the Chemical Bank with the caption, "What an international banker with unlimited vision can do for a business with unlimited potential." But Finnegan is a diversion.

BOSS is considered low-key compared to the much more aggressive and tough Chicago Red Squad for example. But the fact is the files in their inconspicuous Hudson St. office include dossiers on an estimated 250,000 people in New York right now. The city's squad includes 200-250 overt agents who go to public activities like demonstration (not counting informers and undercover agents who infiltrate organizations). Their budget is estimated at about $3 million.

In New York, BOSS is an elite corps, that according to oneobserver, "cops are tearing down the walls trying to get into. They can walk into any precinct in the city and are treated like visiting dignitaries."

Two of the plaintiffs found out very painfully. Jonah Raskin and Bob Riley were in an anti-Nixon demonstration in December of 1969. They were pointed out by BOSS agents to some other cops as "veteran radicals" and were taken to a local station house and beaten by cops while BOSS agents stopped in to see how things were going.

A group of film makers called the Pacific St. Film Collective started filming BOSS at demonstrations and decided to make a film about them--almost as a joke. But the joke soon turned into a serious project when BOSS agents started snooping around their house, hanging on their doors, warning their relatives about them and talking to the employers. Despite these difficulties the film should be out soon.

BOSS' reputation for infiltrating organizations in New York is well known. The organization was using infiltraters (Red Squad people who are specially trained to infiltrate an organization) long before the FBI who were only relying on informers (people who were part of an organization and then decided to sell out.) It is well known that a number of the BOSS agents who testified at the Panther 13 trial were assigned to the N.Y. Black Panther Party at its inception--in fact before most of the Panthers who were on trial had even joined. That is probably the most famous case but there are numerous others.

In the case of the Family Trust (six people who were caught late in 1970, about to firebomb a bank) Boss wiretapped phones, bugged rooms and cars, and used body mikes too. The agent assigned to the Family was chosen for his experience dealing with explosives.

Mechanical Heart Development Announced

WASHINGTON (AP)-Development of a totally implantable complete artificial heart and a nuclear-powered assistant heart, both world firsts, was announced Thursday by government scientists.

Both devices have been used so far only in calves. But the National Heart and Lung Institute scientists said they eventually could help sufferers from cardiovascular disease, which kills one million Americans annually and ranks as the nation's No. 1 killer disease.

Dr. Lowell T. Harmison, the project chief, told a news conference: "The last part of the decade seems a reasonable target" for the first human use of the devices. The project has been under way since 1964.

The artificial heart has been tested successfully in 75 calves during the past six months, but the tests so far have been only for 2 to 10 days.

Also, the devices used have been powered electrically, requiring periodic recharging of the implanted batteries.

But Harmison and Dr. Theodore Cooper, director of the institute, said the artificial heart also can be operated by the same type of nuclear-powered miniature steam engine already at work pumping the assistant heart of the calf that underwent surgery Feb. 14. The nuclear system requires no recharging for a period of at least 10 years.

Dr. Cooper said a complete artificial heart might cost a patient between $5,000 and $6,000, plus hospital and surgical costs comparable to those of a heart-transplant operation.

Harmison said that not all heart disease sufferers would be suitable candidates for an artificial heart, because many have other, concident diseases, for example. But he said that if the device is perfected for human use, between 15,000 and 100,000 Americans per year could benefit initially from such devices.

Moreover, he indicated, thousands more could be helped by auxiliary hearts boosting their own ailing hearts.

Music Club Wants Members

The newly formed UMass. Musicians' Society is now looking for musicians interested in any area of popular music. The society hopes to bring people together who would like to meet and jam with other musicians. All UMass students with any interest in playing contemporary music are eligible for membership.

President Bruce Paynter has stated he wants an organization that provides the same services to popular musicians as those already available to classical musicians. These would include rehearsal rooms for both groups and individuals, as well as instruction in theory and playing.

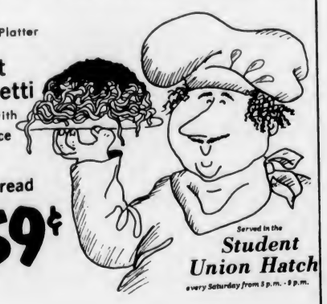
Members will also receive a musicians file listing the instruments played by those belonging to the group. This will be useful in forming bands or just playing together.

Another possibility mentioned by Paynter is the purchase of a four channel stereo tape recorder. Musicians could make quality tapes for possible record-cutting.

Anyone with questions or suggestions is asked to attend the first organizational meeting, Monday March 13 at six-thirty in room 163 Complex, Campus Center.

Porno Merchants Cleared

BOSTON (AP)-The state Supreme Court has overturned obscenity convictions of four Springfield area booksellers, ending a two-year legal battle.



Set aside in a ruling handed down Wednesday were convictions of Gus Bitsacos Jr., 40, of Agawam, former owner of Phoenix News Room, Main Street, Springfield, and his former sales employe, Darlene Billings, 24, of Springfield. Also overturned were the convictions of Anthony J. Lala, 41, of Springfield, and Louis J. Calabrese, 31, of West Springfield. Calabrese is the owner of Walker Book Shop on Main Street, Springfield, and Lala is a clerk.

All four were arrested by Springfield police Jan. 17, 1969, and charged with possession of obscene magazines for sale. All four appealed District Court and Superior Court convictions.

The Supreme Court based its ruling on recent extension of the first amendment by the U.S. Supreme Court, allowing sale of publications showing nude males and females together.

The General

Attorney General Robert H. Quinn presented his performance in Consumer Protection to the students at UMass. We do agree with what he has been doing in that area and support his effort continued efforts in the fight for the consumer.

He came across as a friendly person, someone who would be your good buddy. However, when it came to answering certain specific questions he was often evasive.

When asked twice about his running for the governorship, he replied that he is concentrating on being a good Attorney General, and the future will take care of itself.

He stated at dinner with members of the program council that he is prepared to fight federal court action concerning the Belchertown law suit all the way through the United States Supreme Court.

While agreeing that there should be humane treatment at Belchertown, he never stated that he would use his office to see those conditions come about there.

He enjoyed the coffee hour session in the lounge where he could have more personal interaction with questioning students. However, it would not be hard to construe his motives as merely trying to come across to students as someone that they could trust in office--be that as Governor or Attorney General.

Attributing his political successes so far to his luck in working up through the State House, he emphasized that he is not indebted to any political groups because of campaign contributions.

We think people students should take what he says while remembering that Quinn would like their votes.

Spotlight On CMC

By PHILIP R. CHRISTENSEN

As Director of the Completely Modular Curriculum (CMC) Planning Project, I read with concern Barbara Ann Boulden's letter to the editor about modularization at the School of Education (Tuesday, February 29). I have spoken with Ms. Boulden on several occasions about her worries. The basic frustration which she expresses is an important one; we are neither unaware nor uncaring about it. Unfortunately, her analysis of the situation is highly inaccurate one. Many of the "facts" which she cites in her letter are simply not true. In order to set the record straight, and perhaps to allay some of Ms. Boulden's fears, I would like to respond to her in some detail.

Ms. Boulden accuses the CMC of "disregard for the undergraduate's interest." This is far from the truth, as can easily be seen by examining the specific points she makes. She states that the open hearings on modularization were publicized only at the School of Education. On the contrary, each of the three meetings was announced in the Collegian. One of those meetings was specifically directed at undergraduates. Indeed, the hearings were purposely scheduled at different times of the day so that it would be possible for interested students to attend, whatever their class schedules.

Ms. Boulden claims that because the School of Education is now deciding whether or not to implement the proposal, there is no time left to revise or amend it. On the contrary, what the School is now considering (and what the University will soon consider) is the basic concept itself plus a set of models for administering it. After approval is obtained, the final details will be hammered out. It is during this time that the kind of issues raised by Ms. Boulden can be most effectively considered. During the implementation/revision stage, we have every intention of obtaining as much input from undergraduates as the UMass student body is willing to provide. Such responses can focus on the nitty-gritty issues which affect the daily life of students at this University.

Ms. Boulden suggests that the CMC neglects existing problems at the School of Education, such as advising. On the contrary, from the very beginning of our planning work we have focused on those aspects of the School which seem to need the most improvement. The Completely Modular Curriculum proposal is not only a means of expanding the flexibility of the School of Education, but also a way of correcting existing faults. A major part of the report to the community, for example, deals with our advising system. This one component represents a more carefully planned and potentially more effective advising system than the School has ever before considered.

Finally, Ms. Boulden accuses the CMC of not allowing students to participate in "building the curriculum for themselves" and preventing faculty from becoming more involved with students. On the contrary, modularization will facilitate both of these tasks. A modular structure will make it easier than ever before for a student to build a personally tailored course of study from experiences offered by the School. The proposal also contains a clearing house concept, which involves an office solely devoted to helping students design their own learning experiences when nothing appropriate is being given by the institution itself. Furthermore, when faculty members are freed from the rigorous confines of the semester mold, they will be able to plan their own program to allow in-depth contact with many different types of students.

Not only are there factual inaccuracies in Ms. Boulden's letter, there is also a major incorrect implication. Her tone suggests that the Completely Modular Curriculum is another major change at the School of Education, which will cause hardships for students, faculty, and administrators. Modularization is not a major substitute for existing School of Education programs, but rather a basic restructuring of those programs in order to allow a more efficient accomplishment of existing goals. The primary purpose of the CMC has always been to offer undergraduates some of the flexibility now enjoyed only by graduate students. The CMC offers a new system of record keeping, with supporting administrative mechanisms, as a way of accomplishing this. Most of Ms. Boulden's basic concerns relate not to modularization, but to existing difficulties at the School of Education. The CMC is one attempt to solve these problems.

It would be foolish of me to say that we could not have done a better job of soliciting undergraduate input during the initial planning stages of the project. But it is simply unjust to say that no such efforts were made. Through the medium of open hearings, through individual consultation with undergraduates, and through contact with those students already participating in our limited modular credit program, we received a number of suggestions and criticisms from undergraduate students at the University. All of these played a part in the production of our report to the community. Once we are sure that the project will be implemented, we will go even further to both orient students and obtain their advice.

The door of the Modular Credit Office is always open to any student. Perhaps Ms. Boulden would enjoy talking to a few of the dozens of undergraduates who have expressed their excitement and surprise at the benefits which modularization offers them. I invite her, or any other interested student, to drop by Room 227-C in the School of Education, or to give us a call (5-0944)--to chat, to pick up their own copy of the report to the community, to ask questions, or to offer constructive suggestions as to how we can improve our plans.

The CMC is not the greatest thing to happen to education since Thomas Dewey bubble gum cards, but it is, we feel, a significant step forward, especially for the School of Education's undergraduate program. I hope my fellow students and other interested members of the University community will judge these claims on the basis of the facts, not inuendos.

State's Cover Is Blown

WASHINGTON--One of the best-kept secrets of the Nixon Administration was blown during the President's trip to China last week. The American people discovered that there is a highly confidential organization advising the President on foreign affairs which is called the State Department. The head of this secret apparat is a lawyer named William Rogers, an old friend of President Nixon.

This is how the existence of this undercover agency was revealed. When President Nixon went to China, he was seen in the company of a sandy-haired man who rarely left the President's side. Most reporters on the trip assumed he was a Secret Service man and paid no attention to him.

But then the President went to visit Chairman Mao Tse-tung, and the newspapermen discovered that the sandy-haired man did not accompany Mr. Nixon. This knocked out the theory that the mysterious person was a Secret Service agent.

When questioned about what the person was doing on the trip, Ron Ziegler reluctantly admitted that the man's name was William Rogers and he held the title of secretary of state, and he has something to do with foreign affairs, though Ziegler refused to go into it any further.

Meanwhile, back in Washington, reporters were trying to find out more about the State Department and where it fitted into the diplomatic picture.

The White House seemed very disturbed about the leak, and J. Edgar Hoover has been ordered to find out who blew Mr. Rogers' cover.

A White House spokesman told me, "It does no good for the security of the nation to talk about the role of the State Department in foreign affairs. The people who revealed the existence of Mr. Rogers and the agency he represents may believe they were reporting news, but in effect they are only giving aid and comfort to the enemy."

"Does the revelation of the State Department mean that Henry Kissinger is not running the entire foreign policy of the United States?"

"It means no such thing. All policies on foreign affairs are still made by the 'Department of Kissinger' or, as we call it here, the DOK. The State Department, and I'm not confirming there is one, mind you, is sort of a backup organization which provides the President with information he might miss from his usual sources."

"If this is true, why all the mystery about the organization? Why hasn't the country heard about the State Department before? And why has the identity of William Rogers, as head of it, been kept a secret?"

"The President believes that there are certain agencies that can operate better if they are not publicized. If people knew what Mr. Rogers did, he would not have the freedom of movement that he has now. He can go anywhere in the world without being recognized. The President can assign him missions that would be impossible for someone as well known as Henry Kissinger to take. The State Department, because of its anonymity, has been able to perform a great service to the nation."

"Do you believe the gamble of taking Mr. Rogers to Peking was worth all the trouble that the State Department is now in?"

"That's Monday morning quarterbacking. From the beginning we were aware that it was a calculated risk to allow Mr. Rogers to be seen in such close proximity to the President. But at the time the decision was made, we had no idea that the President would meet Mao Tse-tung, and Rogers wouldn't."

"Will the State Department be dismantled, now that its role is out in the open?"

"That decision is up to Dr. Kissinger."

On Students Offering Support

To the Editor:

Recently, a federal judge decided in favor of a class action suit filed against the State Department of Mental Health, by the Friends of Belchertown. He halted all admissions and discharges until a set of proposals were begun to be implemented (he gave them thirty days). The State is now appealing that decision.

In the heat of all this an organization was formed, called Student Offering Support. The purposes of this organization are to spread information as to the condition of the Belchertown State School (we can safely assume that all state training schools are in approximately the same condition) and to provide support to the parents involved in this class action suit.

What are we asking for? Basically we are asking for human rights for the retarded in state training schools. We are asking that they be given the chance to live a decent life, that they have the right to personal possessions, the right to privacy in living quarters and toilet facilities, the right to be protected against cruel and unusual punishment, the right to proper medical care, and the right to a decent education and/or proper physical training. The state is denying these people their inalienable rights because of a lack of funds. This is not a constitutionally adequate reason to deny people their rights, and by far is not a humane reason considering how much money is wasted on useless trivia in this state.

Governor Sargent in the middle of this controversy decided that it was time to play politics and cut the funds for Belchertown. It's about time that they stopped playing politics with people's lives. We are going to win our case, but as is already obvious it's going to be a hard fight for an organization with little resources to fight the state. Court cases involve extensive financial resources. A gross injustice would be committed if this case were lost due to a lack of funds needed for the legal process.

The Student Senate will be voting next week on whether to transfer the concert funds to SOS. Talk to senators that you know, sign our petitions that are being circulated and if you want to do more come to our meeting next Monday night. Retarded people for too long have been treated as second class citizens and have been thrown into institutions and forgotten about. It's about time we put an end to it.

Saving Best For First

To the Editor:

On February 24, I noticed a feature story by Douglas Patch entitled "Best Issue Raises Questions." This story was a brief one summarizing Professor Michael Best's controversial reappointment to the faculty of the Department of Economics. This man is apparently to be used as an administrative political football as often as they consider and refuse to allow a student-organized and supervised spring concert.

I watched with great interest last year as the issue took shape. As the days progressed and the M.D.C. carried letters and stories presenting the problem for student reaction, it became obvious that Professor Best had quite a lot of support.

I can foresee the whole question arising again this spring, so I would like to make an early statement.

I am a junior and have taken approximately 30 three credit courses (at the conclusion of this semester). I had the good fortune to have Professor Best for an introductory Economics course last year and I can say without hesitation that he is one of the four best (excuse the word choice) instructors that I have had at the University. His interest in his field and related political concern is obvious through his choice of reading material and his method of lecturing. These things are communicated effectively to the student and he gives life to what is potentially a "down" course to other than economic majors.

Last spring, petitions were circulated by concerned students asking the Provost to consider carefully before making what appears to be a blatant political move. I would suggest to the Provost this year that he search harder among the old guard for "professorial dead wood" and consider revision of the existing "publish or perish" and tenure rules. Perhaps for a novel and refreshing change, the opinions of the affected students should be considered.

Friends Needed

To the Editor:

The media has recently contained much criticism of the deplorable conditions in State Hospitals and local ones in particular. Present state and federal funding to alleviate such conditions is grossly inadequate. As far as national priorities are concerned, mental illness probably ranks near the bottom of the scale.

Obviously, adequate care of the mentally ill will require rearranging priorities to provide funds for additional professional services and the necessary improvement and enlargement of physical facilities. However, there is another form of assistance that is desperately needed and which connot be provided by public funds; it is the help and support that can be supplied only by a "friend". There are hundreds of people in our hospitals who are not incurably ill. One of their greatest sufferings occurs during periods of lucidity. It is then that they feel most alone, alienated and discouraged by a sense of their own inadequacy and helplessness.

"The greatest good we can do for others is not just to share our riches with them but to reveal theirs to themselves". Volunteers are needed to spend an hour or two of their time each week just talking with patients in a helping relationship. Helping another who is hospitalized to feel wanted, accepted, dignified and able by sharing a few moments of pleasant conversation with them may provide the one ounce of strength needed by many to start them down the path of recovery.

But what will you receive for your efforts? The return may be small. However, a clearer understanding of mental illness, the joy of bringing reassurance and comfort into the life of another and a fuller appreciation and deeper gratitude for our own physical and emotional health may be a compensation which far surpasses our meager efforts.

May I commend many of my fellow students for their concern and activity on behalf of the mentally ill at Belchertown and Northampton State Hospitals. May we call upon the generosity of many more in the University community to share an hour or two of themselves by attempting to bring a little solace into the lives of other people less fortunate than ourselves.

Letters

As in previous years the MDC will continue to print letters to the editor. The only requirements are that they be typed at sixty spaces, double-spaced and absolutely no longer than two pages in length. All letters must be signed and the author's address and telephone numbers must be included. No letter will be published without this information. Also, no letters will be printed without the name of the author. Please note this change in policy.

All letters are subject to editing either for content or space according to the judgment of the editors. Also, due to space limitations, we do not guarantee that all letters will be printed.

THE EDITORS

A Letter To The People

Approximately one and one-half years ago I graduated from the University of Massachusetts. Several weeks after that I received a draft notice. Because of a personal religious belief that no man should kill another man and because the United States military accepts killing as a means to an end I informed the local Selective Service (draft) board of my being conscientiously unable to be a part of its organization. I also informed the board of my willingness to serve this nation and earth as a conscientious objector in a non-violent civilian capacity.

After reviewing my request the local board refused to reopen my classification to grant me the conscientious objector status. Furthermore, according to Selective Service laws, I presented my claim too late to appeal the local decision to the state board.

I was then faced with the following alternatives-join the United States Army and ignore my conscience or refuse to join the United States Army and follow my conscience. I decided to refuse to join the Army.

With letters supporting my sincerity from a Catholic priest, a Catholic nun and high school principal, a high school teacher and teaching supervisor, a veteran United States military officer and candidate for Congress, a longtime friend, a public high school principal, a director of a non-profit institution where I was employed, a mayor of a city and a superintendent of public schools where I was employed I approached the American court system with my case. All these individuals knew me and worked with me and, although they were not conscientious objectors, they felt that I should be classified a conscientious objector.

Now, a year and one-half after first receiving a draft notice I have been found guilty of refusing to submit to induction, classified as a felon in American society and sentenced to begin a year jail sentence in an American prison. I learned of this decision through a news release in the local newspaper and not from the United States Court of Appeals that upheld the decision of a lower federal court.

I have found the entire experience interesting. I sense it to be the result of the chaning times I am a part of and the beginning of an exciting new era for man, earth and cosmic order.

I write this to publicly thank my parents, relatives and friends-both personal and those ideologically associated with me-whose availability has been immeasurably reassuring. I also write this to encourage continued non-violent resistance to the forces of anger and fear that exists in society. Celebrating life as life's most precious gift and loving every man without exception must be no only the goal but more importantly the means of a life of peace and brotherhood.

Strive on and refuse to be a tool of negativism and destruction. Develop a sense of being a part of mankind and follow your conscience accordingly. Peace.

To Be Read

To the Editor:

Whether or not the S.O.S. obtains the ten thousand signatures they desire is irrelevant. They have given far to little information on the court cases they intend to use the concert funds for.

Will the people in Belchertown State Hospital benefit in reality by the 28 parents winning their case, or will it turn into only a way of getting back at the state? Do we have a large number of students jumping on the S.O.S. bandwagon because of the state's failure to appropriate funds to the Boltwood Program?

It was not made clear by the petitioners that this was a class action suit and these 28 people would not run off with a large sum of money by winning the case. It is important to remember that the concert money is desired to help bring charges against the state and the patients at Belchertwon might never see any result from this money.

Another question that must be raised is the one of whether or not this is a valid way of raising funds. What if some group decided it would be better to do something about poverty with the money appropriated for the Daily Collegian? It could be said it's better solving problems with the money than reading about them.

We are given no indication of the wealth of the 28 parents, or the number of their other sources. Our concert money might not be needed at all. If it comes to it, a campus wide vote should be taken on this issue. Petition names are not really significant in that some people will sign anything. It might be wise for many people to take a more pragmatic look instead of being totally blinded by Humanitarian desire. We would like to point out that the front page editorial by Robert Callahan, Jr., tended to raise issues that did not exist. We are asked to make a choice between our selfish concert interests and the suffering in Belchertown. We see no good reason for such a choice to be made. Why was not funding asked for directly from the Student Senate?

We think also that the use of the front page editorial should be frowned upon since William Loeb has sole rights to it.

Health Services

Shot Clinic Open

In recent weeks there has been a large number of inquiries regarding the availability of immuizations at the Health Services. Particularly, who is eligible to receive them, and when they are given.

Most immunizations are made available for students and covered under the prepaid health program. For faculty and staff, immunizations are made available for special work-related hazards and for travel when it is related to University responsibilities. This, however, does not apply to their dependents.

The Health Center has been designated the Yellow Fever Immunization Clinic for Western Massachusetts. This is a public service and is available to area residents on a charge basis. The charge if $1.50 which is paid at the Pharmacy (Room 106) prior to receiving the immunization.

All immunizations are given by appointment only which can be made by calling 545-0057 (on campus phone 5-0057). Regular immunization clinic hours are Wednesday, 1:00 to 4:00 p.m. The Yellow Fever immunizations will be given only between 2:00 and 3:00 p.m. on Wednesdays.

Due to the increased volume of immunizations given during the spring months, from April 1 to May 28, immunization clinic hours will be: Wednesday, 1:00 to 4:00 p.m. and Thursday, 8:00 to 12:00 noon and 1:00 to 4:00 p.m. and are also by appointment only.

She turned quickly and started running. I called but she didn't hear me. The train was rumbling overhead and the noise was deafening. I never saw her again, and thinking back now, I don't think I want to. I have a date with Helen tonight. (MDC photo by Don Saint-Pierre)

Abernathy Attacks The System

PROVIDENCE (AP) — In a broad attack on the American political and social system, the Rev. Ralph David Abernathy has declared the country "guilty of murder and kidnap" for its policies in Vietnam and its past treatment of blacks.

Rev. Abernathy also defended Angela Davis, now on trial in California in connection with the shooting deaths of four persons, before an audience of about 200 persons at Brown University Wednesday.

Rev. Abernathy, successor to the late Dr. Martin Luther King as head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, claimed that "Angela Davis is on trial simply because she is black."

Miss Davis, also charged with conspiracy in an August 1970 shootout in the Marin County Civic Center which left four persons dead, "is on trial because she is a black intellectual who did not hide behind a desk somewhere and because of her beliefs," he said. She is an avowed Communist.

Questioning of Miss Davis can get a fair trial anywhere in the United States, Rev. Abernathy said. "Already she's been tried in the public news media and already found guilty by the President of the United States."

"We must fight for the freedom of Angela Davis, but cry that America must be free of all political prisoners," he said in his talk sponsored, in part, by a group backing Miss Davis.

In attempting to support his murder charge against the U.S., Rev. Abernathy said the military has dropped more bombs in Vietnam than it did throughout World War II and the Korean War combined.

The country was guilty of kidnaping, he said, when its sailors began the slave trade.

Rev. Abernathy challenged government spending priorities that paid "thousands of dollars to send Vice President Spiro Agnew around the world passing out state."

"Instead, if he wanted something to do, he should have been in Alabama, Los Angeles or even Providence passing out bread to hungry children," he said.

His travels around the country, Rev. Abernathy noted, are part of an attempt to forge a coalition of poor people to create a political force that could turn President Nixon out of the White House.

"We have the opportunity to seize nonviolently the government by marching on the ballot box," he said. "We have the responsibility to evict from the White House Richard Milhous Nixon."

"We have a chance in 1972 to change the course of American history and we have to do it all the way from the court house to the White House," Rev. Abernathy added.

Worcester's Hospitals May Expand

SHREWSBURY, Mass. (AP) — Gov. Francis W. Sargent said the State Public Health Council would meet in special session today to consider a plan permitting immediate expansion of services in Worcester area hospitals.

In a statement prepared for delivery at a news conference, Sargent said, "The plan will provide for extended health services consistent with rational health planning.

"In this way, we will avoid the unnecessary costs of duplication."

Two weeks ago, the governor asked the Public Health Council to delay action on expansion applications submitted by Worcester area hospitals.

"I did so," the governor said, "because with the existing plans for a 400-bed teaching hospital at the University of Massachusetts and its impact on all other intended plans for expansion of health services, it was important to bring all the parties together.

"We needed to establish a comprehensive plan and a continuing mechanism to assure quality health care without imposing unnecessary costs on taxpayers and health insurance subscribers."

Following two weeks of meetings, Sargent said, satisfactory agreements have been reached which will "provide for the expanded health care at lower costs without sacrificing quality of medical care."

Program Change

Amherst, Mass.--The Great Decisions forum originally scheduled for broadcast over radio WFCR (88.5 F.M.) Tuesday night, Feb. 29, has been rescheduled for Friday, March 3, at 7 p.m.

Technical difficulties prevented the broadcast earlier this week, but the panel discussion was taped for broadcast Friday night. Featured on the UMass-Amherst program will be "Our China Policy: How Far and How Deep the Thaw?"

Luther A. Allen, UMass associate professor of political science will be moderator. Panelists will include Franklin W. Houn of the UMass political science department; Barry Keenan, Mount Holyoke College history department; and Ray Moore, Amherst College history department.

The one and a half hour program will preempt the Louis Lyons show.

Women March

Women's International Day will be celebrated here, March 8, with a campus march led by the Orchard Hill Colloquim: Women in Politics and Economy. The march is designed to dramatize demands for improved status of both working and student women at UMass.

The march will begin at 11:00 A.M. leaving from these three places: Orchard Hill; Amherst Town Commons; and Soutwest; followed by a rally at noon in the S.U. Ballroom.

An all-women roster of speakers is scheduled to voice demands that include: 1) Free 24-hour University supported day-care centers; 2) A pay-hike for women janitors at the University bringing them to the same pay level as men janitors; and 3) uniform admission standards to UMass calling for admittance of more women, blacks, and foreign students.

The coordinator of the O.H. colloquium, Zoe Best, said that "W. I. D. is important all over the world as a time when women are honored for their struggles and the work they do. UMass women will share this feminist spirit as they exchange demands and feelings on current conditions of work and political issues with each other."

Cloudy and rainy this morning with temperatures reaching the 50's. Partially clearing this afternoon, winds 15-20 out of the west. (Beware of the western wind.) Clearing and cooler tonight. All the slush will freeze. Watch out when you're driving late at night, especially if inebriated.

Partially cloudy tomorrow with winds shifting to from the Northwest. Temperatures between 30-45. Be careful when you're driving, especially if you see flashing blue lights.

Sunday, it will be clear until mid-afternoon, when a snowstorm will come out of the northwest, pushed along by 25-mile-an-hour winds. Approximately 15-20 inches. Temperatures in the teens.

Libbers Dust "Ladies'" Photos

BERKELEY, Calif. (AP) — The University of California Art Museum agreed to close for one day a display of prostitutes' photographs after the exhibit was picked by women's liberationists.

Ellen Sander, national secretary of the National Organization of Women, and about a dozen other women marched outside the museum Wednesday where the E.J. Bellocq photographs, showing prostitutes of 1912 in various stages of dress and undress, are on display.

Museum official Bonnie Baskin said, "They are beautiful–some of them appear the way your grandmother would have as a young girl.

"These pictures are about as lascivious as a dog food ad," she added.

Bellocq, of French origin and believed to have died in 1938, photographed the girls in New Orleans brothels.

Most are fully clothed, naturally posed with flowers and pets, but some are nudes.

The demonstrators said they perpetuated the degregation and exploitation of women.

"Why don't you have any photos of the male buyers?" yelled one of the demonstrators.

Miss Baskin consulted with other museum officials and agreed to post the demonstrators' letter of protest next to the display, and to close it on March 8, which is International Women's Day.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

by SYDNEY OMARR

Libre can be e world beater but needs a "cheering section." Natives of this zodiacel sign thrive on flettery. The classical Libren can overcome odds and succeed if e "special person" has feith and puts it on record. Libre harmonizes with Leo, Segittarius, Gemini end Aquarius. There is attraction where Aries is concerned, but caution should be exercised with Capricorn end Cancer.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Marriage, partnerships, speciel reletionships are spotlighted. Sudden chenges occur. Protect image. Concentrete on public reletions. You can now receive recognition that is overdue. Be e grecious winner.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Unusuel procedures due to succeed. Strive for originality. Look to future instead of brooding about past. Your efforts will be eppreciated. Employment picture is subject to fevoreble change.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Romantic interests are featured. Write letter which reveals your true teelings. Be creetive. Break barriers of emotional restriction. Be yourself-adhere to personal style. Let others imitate you.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Trust hunch. Intuitive Intellect is honed to razor sherpness. Changes occur in home, domestic area. Investment aimed et building security pays dividend. Optimism repleces recent skepticism.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Plenty of activity indicated, including trips, replies to messages and special communications. Versetility, entertainment are highlighted. Sociel lite eccelerates. Obtein valid hint from Cancer message.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Financial situation fluctuates. Gein shown if you stick to basics. What you seek is eveilable. But don't neglect essentials. Tendency now is to be impatient. Requisite, however, calls for adherence to routine.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Publicity could accompany efforts. Don't try to hide light under proverbial bush. Shine forth with ebilities, desires. Member of opposite sex could prove valuable elly. Respond accordingly. Recognition is due.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Areas thet have been conceeled are meede eveilieble. You are eble to successfully utilize lessons learned in past. Some shakeups ere due. On the whole, these benefit you. Welcome progress.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Unusuel procedure can be utilized to make gains vie professional endeavors. Friends, hopes end wishes blend and you are happier. Pisces figures prominently. Don't be efreid to be romantic.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Accept responsibility, including overtime assignment. Rewards now can be substential. Your own unique style is eppreciated. Don't change it or copy others. Aim high; velue yourself and others will, too.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Travel opportunity-and desire-is activated. Your philosophy concepts gein wider attention. You are eppreciated. Your counsel will be sought. Those at a distence get in touch. Put ideas on paper.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): New epproach breaks financiel logjem. Get to heart of matters. Articulete desires. Reach understending with mate, close associete. Trying to hide things now would be error. Know this and act like you know it.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you have sparkling sense of humor. You can handle large projects, but often fall down when it comes to handling details. By October, you will be riding high-you will overcome emotional setback and will be on your feet.

JV's Make It A Happy Ending

By ROY LYONS

The UMass jayvees capitalized on a shorthanded situation midway through the second period Wednesday night and went on to smother the UConn jayvees 10-1 at Orr Rink. The Redmen scored two unassisted goals while Kevin Thompson was serving a two minute minor. Left winger John Muse got the first shorthanded tally at 12:52, outracing the defense on a breakaway and then stuffing a backhander behind the sprawling UConn goalie. Ron Smith followed this up a minute later with a mid-ice fluke that completely disheartened the UConn squad. The issue was never in doubt after that.

UMass dominated the first period with Kevin Connors providing the impetus. Following defenseman Brian Mulcahy's opening marker at 5:12, Kevin closed out the scoring for the period with two goals, one at 7:28 and the other at 19:39. He rang the first one off the far post after working himself in position with some clever stick handling. It was a power play goal with Breig off for tripping. On the second he caught the UConn defense flatfooted as he circled the net and jammed it home. John Binkowski made a tremendous save at about the four minute mark, robbing a UConn forward who walked in alone.

UMass coach Russ Kidd pulled Binkoski with the game half over and inserted Steve Moran, as he made an effort to give everyone some ice time in the team's final contest. Kevin Connors potted his third goal at 18:12. Jay Connors set up his brother's hat trick with a perfect centering pass. A breakaway bid by Bill Mintiens was turned aside on a brilliant save by the beleagured UConn goalkeeper, and the period ended with UMass in command 6-0.

The action in the third period remained one-sided. The Huskies continued to simply dump the puck into the UMass zone, a tactic they pursued throughout the game. Paul Allen, Dave Keough, and Wayne Douglas ran the score to 9-0 before Nekowitz broke the shutout bid with the only UConn goal of the night. Allen's wrist shot, following a brilliant shift at the blue line, broke off the goalie only a minute and a half into the final period. Keough was set up by Douglas, who did some tough digging behind the net to get the puck in front. It came at 3:06. They traded places at 12:53 with Douglas scoring and Keough assisting. Nekowitz then lifted a high wrist shot past Moran at 13:13 to put UConn on the board, but Thompson's power play goal, the final one of the game, put UMass into double figures two minutes before the final buzzer.

Besides the spark provided by Kevin Connors, who was flying all night long, the Redmen blue-liners all put forth a determined effort, particularly Brian Mulcahy. The victory gave the team a final mark of 6-6-1.

Gymnasts In Boston

By JANE CROOK

After having compiled a 7-2 record in dual meet competition this season, the UMass Varsity Gymnastics team will compete in the 5th Annual New England College Invitational Gymnastic Championships this Saturday, to be held at M.I.T. Preliminary competition will get underway at 11 a.m. and run until 5 p.m., determining team standings, all-around winners, and qualifiers for the finals, which will be held later that evening.

Last year the Redmen finished a disappointing second, losing to Springfield by only .2 of a point. The meet was one which saw UMass, who was in last place in their division after floor exercise, continually strive to chip away at the Springfield lead, only to lose by such a narrow margin. Thus UMass scored an amazing 157.1, and collected 14 individual medals, their effort to topple the Chiefs from the number one position in New England had failed.

Coach Erik Kjeldsen's Redmen, tied for 2nd place in the Eastern League will compete in the University Division against Southern Connecticut and Springfield. Teams entering the meet will compete in one of two divisions. The University Division consists of teams having scored 125 points or more in a dual meet this season, while all other New England teams will compete in the College Division.

The meet will include both team and individual competition. The top five performers in the University Division and the top three in the College Division in each event will compete in the finals, which will begin at 7:30 pm.

During the regular season, UMass defeated So. Conn. 152.45-144.60, but the Owls are expected to be stronger now. They are led by all-around man John Crosby, who scored a surprisingly low 48.55 against the Redmen in December.

UMass' biggest rival will be Springfield College, as the Chiefs are the only N.E. team to have defeated the Redmen this year. On February 9th, the Chiefs downed the Redmen 156.2-154.7. UMass has the potential to avenge the loss, but must compete as a team to do so. The hitting percentage looks to be crucial again.

Massachusetts will enter Tony Vacca and Steve Scuderi in the all-around. Last year Vacca finished fourth in this grueling event, as well as placing second on the high bar.

Other Redmen standouts will include Jack Berner and John Calabria, who placed fifth on floor last year; Steve Nelson and Rich Seikunas on sidehorse; Danny Spier, John Oliver, and Jay Aronstein, who placed fifth, on the rings; Jay Thompsen who finished second in vaulting in the division; Dave Genest who tied for first on p-bars; and Tom Myslicki on the high bar.

The Redmen squad will be seeking to improve their second place finish of the past two years, as both times Springfield College has edged them for top honors.

Frosh Go For Perfect Season

By FRANK ANTOSIEWICZ

Tomorrow night, the unbeaten freshman basketball squad travels to Providence, seeking their sixteenth consecutive victory against Brown University. For the 1971-72 yearlings, this will be their last obstacle of the season, as they attempt to duplicate the undefeated season of those that are presently seniors.

Brown, which has lost only two road games, to Boston College in overtime and to Dartmouth, will present a stiff challenge to Coach Fan Gaudette's cagers. The Brown freshmen, emphasizing quickness, are considered one of the top frosh units in New England.

Coach Gaudette expects to start the same fivesome that has terrorized the opposition all season. So far, John Murphy leads the team in points and rebounds with 20.9 p/g and 13.3 rb/g. Bill Endicott is next on the point parade with 18.1 p/g, followed by Tom Gillams with 16.5, Mike Flanagan with 13.5 and Jim Burke with 11.9. The stats are comparably impressive when it is noted that Tom Gillams follows Murphy closely in the rebound column, averaging 12.5 rb/g and the two guards, Endicott and Burke had 7.1 and 6.2 caroms per game.

Thus, the statistically impressive cagers face their last challenge of the season.

Pucksters Host St. A's

By BILL BALLOU

This is the time of year that is most unpleasant for hockey coaches. By the time the month of March has rolled around, a coach has found himself in one of two positions. Either he has suffered through a dismal season and missed the playoffs, or he has had a successful year and faces the opportunity to participate in post-season action.

However, being in the playoffs generally means that a coach finds himself walking around thinking horrid throughts about getting knocked out in the first round, finds that his palms are sweating profusely, and finds that his stomach has a funny little feeling inside of it from the time he wakes up until he finally falls asleep.

UMass head hockey coach Jack Canniff is no different from any other coach. He feels the pressure. The smile is still there, but it's a little forced. There's still a chuckle, but it's a nervous one.

The playoffs start for UMass tomorrow at 3 PM in Orr Rink and marks the first of what Canniff hopes will be three winning playoff games. The Redmen lost to St. A's, 5-4, a couple of weeks ago up there, but they still rate as favorites to win this one and advance to the second round.

In fact, Canniff thinks his club could go all the way. He's not cocky by any means, and he's just as concerned about this upcoming game as he could possibly be. But he knows his team and his talent.

"You just hate to look ahead," he stated, "because in a single elimination series all it takes is one game and Bang! you're hanging up your skates for the season."

"But I'll tell you this; when we're right we're as good as anyone in this division. We can do it, there's no question about it; we've got the horses."

Canniff says he has the horses, and he's going to take these playoff games one at a time. He also says that the Redmen are going to offer "no excuses."

But, and it's a big "but", the Redmen do have physical problems. Bob Shilalie, Mike Waldron, and Don Riley have some degree of injury, although it appears that Shilalie is the only one in danger of missing the game. Pat Keenan and Jim Coleman, both centers, have been complaining of feeling "run down" as of late and are being tested in the Infirmary. Hopefully they'll be able to play on Saturday.

Playoff hockey is usually conservative, tight-checking, defensive hockey. UMass has not been playing like that as of late. If they hope to go anywhere they must, as Canniff diagnosed, "tighten up."

There's something special about playoff hockey. This playoff game starts at 3 PM Saturday at Orr Rink. Be there for a treat. If you can't, tune in on WMUA.

It could be the start of something big.

Boot Hill Relived At Fordham

By EARLE BARROLL

Home court advantage?...Like you've never heard it before!!!

UMass basketball has seen it on the road, they've experienced it themselves at the Cage, but when it comes time to separate the home court from the home court, you had better start right at the top with Fordham University.

Tomorrow night at 8, the cagers step onto the wildest and most formidable away court they will have been at this season when they take on the N.I.T.bound Fordham Rams.

The Rams have not lost at home in two years, a home court that goes by the name of Rose Hill, but which Jack Leaman calls through experience "Boot Hill."

The rise of Fordham to a position of eastern prominance has been hashed over time and again. Last year, Digger Phelps, in his first year, inherited a 10-15 team from the year before and in one season took them to the eastern regionals of the NCAA tournament and a 26-3 record including an 87-79 win over the Redmen here at the Cage.

Phelps has left for Notre Dame. Charlie Yelverton, their all-American is now with the Portland Trailblazers. But Fordham has gone on and gone on big again under the leadership of Dr. Hal Wissel from Lafayette and another small yet extremely quick Fordham team.

Their credentials are imposing to say the least: The N.I.T. committee hit them on the initial day the bids went out. Their record is 16-8 including a super win over then nationally ranked Princeton, who earlier in that week (last December) upset North Carolina (This was done on eastern TV at Rose Hill). And while UMass was in Philadelphia, the Rams were runners-up to second ranked Louisville at the Holiday Festival at Madison Square Garden. This included a win over Providence on their way to the finals.

Wissel and Leaman are no strangers to each other. While the new Fordham was at Lafayette he ran a summer camp in the Poconos and Leaman was a special guest during the summer to lecture, teach and show films.

What came out of this was that Wissel took all of Leaman's plays he used at UMass back to Lafayette and now they're at Fordham. As Leaman says, "We don't have to scout Fordham. It will probably be something like a ping-pong game."

Both teams will zone press each other. Fordham made the press famous around the east last season. The Rams are not as big up front as the Redmen but they're leapers and tough and aggressive.

This game is very important to Leaman and his team: "We have got to get us believing we're a good basketball team," he said. "It's much better to be 16-10 than 14-12."

For this to happen the Redmen will have to have the last serve at Boer-Rose Hill.

Frosh Grapplers Second

By JOHN BOCK

New Britain, Conn.-There were two tournaments going on simutaneously at the Central Connecticut State College campus and both teams that participated under the UMass flag, took seconds.

The story of the Varsity struggle with Springfield has been told and all that remains is a post script in the form of a salute to those wrestlers who hung in the consolation matches and picked up valuable points for UMass.

Wrestling in the 126 pound weight class was Mike McGlaughlin, one of four freshmen that wrestled Varsity in the tourney. Mike picked up an easy win in the preliminaries, decisioning his Boston Univ. opponent 7-1, and thus earned the right to advance. In the quarter finals Mike pulled out an 8-4 decision in overtime, besting Silva of Bowdoin in one of the best bouts of the tournament. The next day Mike lost to Hamilton of Central Connecticut 6-4 and put himself in the consolation semi-finals. In his first march he won 5-0 over the boy from Wesleyan, but lost in the finals to Pressman of URI 5-2, thus earning a fourth place trophy and two team points for the Redmen.

Chris Cadwallader lost to Steve Gaydosh, who would take his fourth New England title at 158, after decisioning two opponents in the preliminaries and quarter finals. It was Conan Cadwallader 8-3 over Raphaelson of Brown and 7-2 over Kuentz of MIT. In the first round consolations Conan pulled out a pin in the very last second of the march as he decked Darrin of Bowdoin in 5:59 (Consolation matches were six minutes in length). Bob Wickwire of CCSC was the third seeded man in this weight class and true to his seed beat Cadwallader 5-0 in the consolation finals.

In the same gym, on other mats, the NEIWA Freshman Tournament was being held to coincide with the Versity. UMass had only seven entries, aside from those freshmen that wrestled varsity and were ineligible. The seven entries were John Mulvihill at 113, Dick Muri at 126, Don Bergeron at 134, Allan Elmont at 142, Steve Rome at 150, Jack Beaudry at 158 and Steve Schwartz at Heavyweight.

Mulvihill, Beaudry and Schwartz failed to place as the lost in the first round of both the regular and consolation bouts. None went down without a fight, however, as Mulvihill lost a tough one to Tobia of RIC 4-1. Beaudry lost by a big margin to Swanson of Brown and then lost a last second heart breaker in overtime to Wise of LTI. Schwartz was pinned in the first round by Halpin of LTI, but came roaring back in the first round consolation to decision his opponent Grasso of MIT 10-0. The semi-final round proved to be disastrous as Schwartz was clamped by Conway of Amherst.

The frosh had five out of seven in the finals and two proved to be the best. At 126 Dick Muri, showing the experience gained in wrestling a few varsity matches, came from his fourth seed position to upset top seeded Cole of SC in the finals 8-1.

Don Bergeron also came from a low seed in the 134 pound class but didn't upset anybody, being decisioned in the finals 10-2 by Coleman of Williams.

Al Elmont proved that no one at the tournament could hold him down as he spent a total time of thirty seconds on the bottom in three matches. But escapes didn't win it for Al as he was taken down a few times to lose 10-4 in the finals to Seymour of Coast Guard.

About the only thing that can be said about Tony Rome is that the only kids he upset in the tourney were the ones he beat which amounted to everyone he wrestled. He demolished Turker of Coast Guard 12-2 in the finals and took the trophy he has been working for all year. Watching him wrestle is a good reminder that a little muslce never hurts.

John Nickerson came from a fourth seed position to meet Capacci of Coast Guard in the finals. John beat the Springfield boy in a brilliant performance in the semis, but seemed to have run out of steam in the final match as the Coast Guard man pinned him late in the second period.

The final team standings are Coast Guard, UMass, MIT, UConn and Williams. Coast Guard won the tournament for the second time in a row as they wrestled a 11 of their freshmen varsity during the season in preparation for the Freshman Tournament.

Some of the boys will be participating in the Army Invitational Plebe Tourney to be held at West Point on March 18, 1972.

Playoff Picks

The Division II hockey playoffs start on Saturday and will continue through to completion on the following Saturday. MDC sports polled its vast reserve of hockey writers and came up with the entire story on how this edition of the Division II playoffs will go.

SATURDAY, MARCH 4

LOWELL TECH 1 at VERMONT 8--Tech is only in the playoffs because New England College couldn't participate. UVM is too strong all over the ice for the Engineers and should have no difficulty in handling them.

ST. ANSELM'S 3 at UMASS 6--The Hawks beat the Redmen up in Manchester by 5-4, but can't expect UMass to play as poorly as they did up there. If the Redmen tighten up on defense they should be able to handle St. Anselm's fairly easily.

SALEM STATE 3 at MERRIMACK 6--Merrimack has been playing extremely well as of late and they own a big 5-4 upset win over Bowdoin. State could be a sleeper but chances are they just don't have the horses.

BUFFALO 4 at BOSTON STATE 3--Buffalo is the question mark surrounding the whole shindig. They only picked up two losses on the season but play a different schedule than New England teams. Boston State has been on the skid lately and has a horrible defense.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 8

If those predictions come true, then this is how it will be played on the following Wednesday night. The highest remaining seed will play the lowest seed and the two in the middle will play each other. Here's how it'll probably stack up.

BUFFALO 3 at VERMONT 5--The Bisons are still a question mark, but their roster is impressive and chances are they'll give the Cats a fight. However, home ice is worth a couple of goals, especially in Vermont.

MERRIMACK 1 at UMASS 4--The Redmen aren't facing the same club they walloped at home a while back. The score could go higher either way but chances are both teams will be playing it extra cautious.

SATURDAY, MARCH 11

IF things are still following the script, then it will come down to UMass vs. Vermont in Burlington on Saturday. Here's how it should all end.

UMASS 2 at VERMONT 4--The heart says UMass, but the figures don't. The Cats have been playing super hockey of late while UMass hasn't. The Redmen beat UVM in OT early in the season with a great performance, but this Vermont team has improved. It'll probably be ended by an empty-net goal.

WMPIRG: To The Rescue?

By JIM LAVRAKAS

"This country has more problems than it should tolerate and more solutions than it uses. . .Our society has the resources and the skills to keep injustice at bay and to elevate the human condition to the state of an enduring compassion and creative fulfillment."

Ralph Nader and Donald Ross from Action for a Change

The statements of an idealistic man, and one of the few among the throngs of idealistic men throughout the ages who has been turning throughts into creative action. And one of the vast, untapped resources that Nader describes is the potential power that exists in student organization. Nader's plan to realize this potential takes the form of a PIRG (Public Interest Research Group) which would deal with the social and economic problems in a particular area.

Anyone who has been accosted by dive-bombing WMPIRG (a Western Massachusetts PIRG) petitioners is now fully aware that PIRG has hit the campus. My first contact with these people has made me immediately allergic to the letters w-m-p-i-r-g when placed in that, or any other order.

If WMPIRG, as a corporation, is going to keep itself immune to the kind of corruption and dirty dealing that it is supposed to investigate there must be safe guards and checks built into it to make this kind of reverse objective impossible to happen. What has Nader built into this group to insure their immunity and how is WMPIRG carrying out Naders guidelines?

"Except in rare cases, a single-campus PIRG is undesirable..." says Nader. "They must build the intercampus relationship. . .They must clearly deliniate lines of authority and control to insure fair representation." He mentions that this is hard to do before the PIRGs in the area are legally recognized, but, he says, "a clear idea of organization (of the different area PIRGs) should be formulated at the outset." The idea of more than one campus with a PIRG also insures that a monopoly of any kind will not exist.

I spoke with Arnold Millette, an organizer of WMPIRG, about this very point that Nader touched upon. He said

The Overthrow: Part VI

We were waiting for him, Nick, Big Louie and I, as he walked out the front doors of Bartlett and headed towards his car on the other side of Herter Hall. We had planned this all week and had coordinated each step of the operation down to the last second. Big Louie carried the "tools" in a briefcase under his arm.

The man opened the passenger door of his car and threw his briefcase in the back seat. We were waiting for just this point. As he got in the car and started to slide over in the seat I hopped in beside him, opened the back door, and, as Nick and Big Louie jumped in the back (we were all wearing the now famous knitten ski masks) I ordered: "Drive." Everything was going without a hitch.

This was "Operation Reprogram". The object was to try and force a complete reversal in the policies of the English 125 program by brainwashing the head man without anyone else discovering the sabotage. And it was coming off; this was intracampus espionage at its best!

I realize that the old proverb "you can't teach an old dog new tricks" was never so apt as in the case of a Commonwealth Professor of English, especially this one. We figured that our brainwashing operation was going to call for some drastic action. We had planned for that.

We were heading down N. Pleasant St. and right opposite the pond Nick went into "phase two" of the plan. He slipped the "Annihilator" over the man's head and I grabbed the wheel. (I will explain to "the less astute among you" - as Mrs. Edwards would say, endearing smile and all - just what the "Annihilator" is. You take one jet pilot's helmet, hook it up to a waterpipe (the bigger the better; we had the best) and you have in your hands one of the truly great innovations of the age, an "Annihilator". It knocked him in a daze in about half a minute. We slid him out of the drivers seat, Nick took his place, and I held the waterpipe. I said I was going to get my revenge on this man and now. . .let the festivities begin!

"What, me?"

"What is your name?"

"Howard O. Brogan". The very name made me boil in rage.

"Do you run the English 125 program?" He answered in the affirmative. Then I let him have it.

"Do you pick your toes?"

"Uh. . .uh. . .wha, wha, what?"

"Do you pick your toes in Poughkeepsie?" I leared at him.

Now, you have to realize that this is the first time that this man, a fifty-plus year old man, had ever been stoned. A traumatic experience if there ever was one. Plus, remember, plus, how would you react to the insinuation that you pick your toes, and in Poughkeepsie, no less!

He went ape. There was nothing we could do with him, he was a total vegetable. We parked the car at the School of Ed. and left him there mumbling to himself. I was joyous that we had left him in such a state but was worried that we had blown the whole plan. I was quiet.

"English 125 is now without a leader!" criedBig Louie. I thought, hey, that's right.

"If only he can hold on as a cabbage brain for another week we can forge onward to our main attack. Without their guard up and their leader incapacitated victory is assured."

We let out a cheer. With the forthcoming main assault in mind, under the auspices of Brogan's mental inactivity, we came closer to Southwest. We HoChiMinh hopped our way through the tunnel of Southwest in the most animated of spirits.

Nixon's The One!

The president's startling trip to China has jolted many people into taking a realistic look at the events of the first Nixon term of office. He has disappointed many people who have been waiting for the inevitable blunder, the old Nixon's loss of restraint. As the Chinese seem to have acknowledged, you can teach an old running dog new tricks. In a rarely seen attempt to appraise the Nixon performance fairly and sympathetically Frank Baglione examines the moods and trends of the President's administration. Turn to page five for one person's opinion of why, in the battle for America, President Nixon has the lead over his critics.

Viewed Through The Perverse

Does the architecture of this campus tease your subconscious like a Russ Meyer Horn flick? This question amongst others of a similar ilk are explored at length and with illustrations in our centerfold where Richard Davis holds sway. His piece may read a bit much into the architecture, if not we have discovered the most audaciously pornographic show since the heyday of Dirty Alice. And, unlike that legendary Miss, you can get your rocks off daily without really trying; just look up, around, and all about you. The truth is in the looking and if you give it a chance you may decide that Marcel Brever is an old letch too.

An Ill-Begotten Affair

Doesn't anyone like anything about the past anymore? In Harold Pinter's screenplay of H.P. Hartley's The Go Between, the past (Victorian England) is a foreign land, "they do things differently there." But in Joseph Losey's direction of this film "different" means "wrong." In a visually pleasing film the Victorian character is once again given a sound trashing (ho-hum). In his review of The Go Between on page thirteen, Bob Nesti has some criticisms suggesting where this film might have gone astray. Somewhat more sympathetic to the characters than Losey, Nesti's film review spots the weaknesses in plot and theme that diminished the completeness of the film.

And Further True-Life Adventures

Do you pick your toes in Poughkeepsie? The wily, curlied haired youth asks on our left and it's the first of many such egnimatic questions raised in this week's issue. On the next page, for instance, is an inquiry into the character and life of Sylvia Plath as presently is being reflected in her best-selling novel The Bell Jar. Then on page six is the question of John Lindsay, does the master of the media and the metropolis have much of a chance in the big time? Read on. Albums? Have we got albums you may ask. Hendrix, the live variety for starters is gone over, and there are more on pages ten and eleven. Made For Each Other, is it, as some have said, the best American comedy in quite some time? Well, Poor Richard's happens to think so and Patrick Sullivan tells us why on page twelve. Ever wonder about headphones, well always willing to please Frank Johnson may have some clues into that essential audio part on page. 14. Then, may you ask, what is the answer to the Puzzle. Well it's here, in full on page 15.

Then Weekend, on page 16.

Correspondences With Poor Richard's

Dear Editor:

Referring to Jeff Clayton's article Christ On Campus: Camping the Crusade, I find that he missed the theme on two important points: first, I disagree with him on certain aspects, but second, I agree with him on many more aspects.

You don't have to be Bible waving nut, a long-haired, dirty, hobo to be a Jesus Freak. Christianity is a missionary faith but that is not the end all. Putting "Christ first in your lives" as you put it, doesn't mean shoving Christ into the lives of everyone you come across, and 'ulterior' motives like squashing "soft, impressionable" freshmen is not what the Good Book says. Being a Christian means living like Christ, and He was not known in His time so much for His Words, as much for His works. He had a smile for everyone, a time for everyone, and a helping hand for everyone.

Jeff, these on campus may be J.Fs, in that every time they have a meeting, they are there - not alone, but with their famous little notebooks taking down notes, making sure they get everything what the speaker says. The result? What happens in any course when you are taking down notes all the while? You miss the personal rapport with the teacher and with the subject. Likewise here, and don't tell me that it is not so.

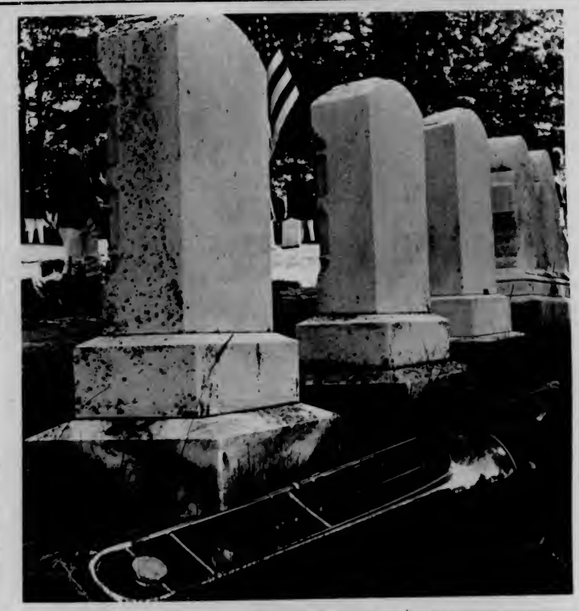
To be one of them means to take LTCs (Leadership Training Courses) - without this you are not a 'full, ready person'. Monday through Sunday, they don't have time for anyone or anything outside their little circle. They are the elite of society. Their valuable time is spent so much in attending Bible studies, rap groups, LTCs, feeding from the Word, that they quite forget about 'feeding' others: they have no time for a word of friendship, no time to help a needy neighbor, no time to just sit and chat. The biggest kick is when it boils down dating: you spew the little booklet at your date and down his guts.

Say man, the other guy on the street is also a human, he too, is flesh and blood. He has problems also, he would like to relax, have a clean, happy, fun time. If my date started shoving the 'four laws' down my throat, I would beat Superman in a getaway.

The other girl, she just wants to cool it on a date, relax and rest, away from the routine of everyday life. She knows that if she is with me, what she will get is a happy, quiet evening, what she won't get is the 'four laws piledriver'.

Christ said, "You are saved of grace, not of works, lest any man boast", and He went on to say "Let your manner of life be worthy of the Gospel", and "Be ye in the world, but not of the world". (Jeff, these here are not in the world, they are out of this world.) Did He tell you to cut yourself off from society, or to work in society?

Wake up to reality? Before Christ rammed the four laws down people's guts, he gave them food, clothing and shelter. He healed them, rapped with them, played with their kids, mixed with their people, helped them in their immediate, personal or material needs.



What does 'your' Christ tell you about Boltwood Project, Room to Move, Mental Health Services, Students Offering Support, the Health Services Student Advisory Board, Food Services Committee, WMPIRG, Coalition for Environmental Quality, Northampton Volunteers - just to mention a few of the organizations run by students on campus, working towards solving people's problems - your people's problems? Does He tell you to disassociate from them, to be a self-centered, in-your-own-group-egocentrist, not to be a part of the working society? Boy, if He tells you that, then you must be having a different Christ, not the Christ of the Bible. Does He tell you to take away my book and then feed me lies like "I don't know where you stay!"? Man, what brand of Christ are you selling?

The Christ of the Bible cared - cared for His people, for His society. Where there was sorrow, behold, He was there. Where there was trouble, problems, hunger, sickness, disease and death, He was there. He wasn't there to gripe or to talk; anybody can do that. He was there to care for them, look after them, and help solve their problems.

No, Jeff, you are right, there is a serious shortage of JF's here. These people aren't JFs. Jesus Freaks care, they care for their brother, for their neighbor. The good samaritan did not give the injured traveller the four laws, he gave him his care. (If you who 'know the Lord' think this story does not apply to you, think again, because exceptions are few and far between.) Since parroting verses back and forth seems to be a basis for their doctrine, let me give you a couple of closings: "They shall know you by your deeds", "For he who knows how to do good, and does it not, it is sin", "What you do unto the least of my brethren, you do unto me", and "Woe to you, you scribes and Pharisees,...you preach, but do not practice".

....Not good works to earn salvation, but because you have it by grace.

Yours,
N. Haridasan

To the Editor:

Steve Feld's latest plunge into the pratfalls of the superstar (Neil Young Finally Comes Around-Poor Richard's, February 25, 1972) once again proved his inadequacy as a music reviewer. He revels in the esoteric, so much so that we are more conscious of Feld the Supergroupie than Feld the objective interpreter of the body of Young's work. Feld makes the statement that "half good and half bad isn't anywhere near good enough," but he misses entirely the fact that After The Gold Rush often fell in to the same lifelessness, and Young has gained his "superstar" status only through a small number of his songs.

Since Young's work is consistent, what is wrong with Harvest? When he's good on this album, he's excellent. "Old Man" shows a welcome side of Neil Young with its picking banjo but Feld's allusion to Stephen Stills "4 and 20" shows ability to make connections that aren't really there. The connection seems to be made more out of the fact that Young and Stills have played in musical groups together and, naturally, their personal lives would gush forth in their works and they'd be eternally linked. This again only shows Feld's obsession with the "groovy" image.

This same sort of idolration which reaks in pseudo-hip fan magazines like Circus and is beginning to creep into Rock. The image is all that matters, to hell with any knowledge of the music and performance. The fact that Mr. Feld reads these journals (plus the rock cultist bible Rolling Stone) shows in the incidental details of his work. Instead of perceptive analysis, we get gossip. Judith Christ does much the same with her film reviews, in fact neither are reviewers at all they're cultists, plain and simple, and the evocation of the "superstar" image cannot compensate for the inanity of the prose.

A Prelude To Breakdown

The Bell Jar: a review by David Ritchkoff

In "The Bell Jar" Sylvia Plath finally got to be herself. Although Ms. Plath may seem to be thrice removed (the book being written by Plath under the psuedonymn of Victoria Lucas about a girl named Esther Greenwood), it seems justifiable to discuss the book as an auto-biographical piece. The Bell Jar allowed Sylvia Plath to pour out the early years of her life, the confusion, the doubts, the "psuedoness" of the brilliant, vivacious college girl. What the reader receives, in turn, is a book that is as personal as any book can possibly be. We are allowed to enter Plath's mind and walk with her through a whirlwind guest editorship summer at "Mademoiselle Magazine" in New York to her attempted suicide on returning home and her time in a posh, private asylum back to recovery. This journey through Greenwood/Plath's mind is an especially powerful one for the student, because it hits close to home and crystalizes feelings that are common in the falseness of the academic world.

Esther Greenwood has been the picture of success in terms of intelligence, education, and rewards. She is a brilliant young writer, poet, and student attending a large woman's college on the east coast (Ms. Plath attended nearby Smith College, graduating "summa cum laude" in 1955.); but behind this glistening facade is the real material for The Bell Jar. Esther Greenwood is enclosed by a transparent prison, a "bell jar" in which she breathes and rebreathes her own "sour air". She begins to be aware of her failure to develop her humanity by locking herself behind a row of straight A's and academic honors. She forces herself to become part of the inanity of society's picture of a "woman" and loses ground quickly.

There is no place for her; she hates the stupidity of her college, the dating, the fakery behind the grades. It is the realization that she can do nothing about her situation that begins her downfall. Little by little Esther slips from reality; she can no longer stand up to the shallowness expected of her in all areas of life. And thus, she tries to end it. The description of an off-balanced mind might well categorize The Bell Jar as strictly a psychological exploration like I Never Promised You a Rose Garden; but Sylvia Plath is doing much more by merely giving us a diary of her thoughts and pulls her book closer to the reader as she pulls the story deeper within her mind. There is something terribly simple as well as something powerful in her description of her attempted suicide: "I felt the darkness, but nothing else, and my head rose, feeling it, like the head of a worm. Someone was moaning. Then a great, hard weight smashed against my cheek like a stone wall and the moaning stopped." As the struggle for reality comes into play for Esther Greenwood the prose becomes somewhat detached and cold. Ms. Plath uses her language to create the actual feeling of an exhausted brain; the sanity is still somehow there, but emotion is gone. Nothing bothers Esther anymore; she has learned to simply not care.

A drawing by Sylvia Plath.

Knowing that Sylvia Plath committed suicide in 1963, we can look at The Bell Jar as a prelude to that second and final emotional breakdown. Small successes again failed to put her mind at peace. Read The Bell Jar, then her Ariel poems to realize the full extent of her torture. She is still the Smithy, caught up in the inadequecy to be a debutante and socialite in The Bell Jar. She is a woman in Ariel, stripped of any facade--ripping the masks off herself. It is almost a waste to read The Bell Jar alone; it is only a one-way trip. Read Ariel for the return.

WMPIRG To The Rescue (Con't.)

that WMPIRG was made up of three different college areas--Springfield Area, Five-College Area, and the "Out-West" Area Colleges (which includes Williams College, Berkshire Community College among a host) which have all been keeping in touch. It seems that lately, however, that several smaller colleges have fallen by the wayside while UMass has concentrated on its blitzkrieg to establish a PIRG at home. Millette said that it will be UMass' job to get these struggling colleges on their feet once again.

WMPIRG (in its proposed by-laws) indicates that it will be a non-profit, nonpartisan-political organization. By doing this the problem of "conflict of interest" and directly biased political influence is all but eliminated.

There is still the problem, however, of another aspect of "conflict of interest". Whether or not this organization is designated "nonpartisan" or not it is still a fact that they will have political influence (although it may not be directly biased). This is a natural thing for any growing corporation with a group of professionals working in the heart of political-social-economic problems.

However, PIRGs are set up with a most democratic structuring and it is possible to remove an undesirable governing board (in WMPIRGs case the Local Board) through a student vote. I asked about this voting process and received some hazy answers: "I'm not sure about that process," one WMPIRG organizer said. Like all voting processes this one should be safeguarded by students by a consistent and massive turn out at the polls. It is up to the student in this case to guard himself.

The question of whether or not the term "coercive" can be aptly applied to the "voluntary fee increase with a guaranteed refund" method used by PIRGs for funding has been the rage of topics to get into a rage about on campus. It is pointed out by Nader that the two other alternatives would be impracticable because they are either "wastefully exorbitant" (the "check off system" of marking a card at registration for which the university charges a 15-20 per cent fee of the total amount collected to cover the costs of handling), or "shamefully coercive" (the mandatory fee system where a student is forced to "pay or leave".) The perspective for looking at the voluntary fee with refund has been made inviting by presenting this biased form of "the lesser of two evils".

However, when this method of funding is presented to the campus body in the form of a petition it becomes more and more democratic to the eye. It is pointed out that a petition campaign needs hundreds of workers to make it successful, whereas, the alternative referendum method can be carried out by "a handful of glib students". This method of funding and gaining student support, therefore, guarantees that at least a hundred people are involved, that it is not a careless, mindless "Potemkin" organization. Nader also demands that there be a good cross-section of students on the campus doing the petitioning. In this WMPIRG has stuck close to Nader's guidelines.

The origins of WMPIRG, its past funding and its future budget are questions that may be bugging the reader at this point. WMPIRG was set up in October of last semester. Its funds since its birth have come from a $3500 grant and a loan of the same amount given by the Rockerfeller Foundation supported Connecticut Valley Commission. WMPIRG, since October, has grown to include twenty colleges (in the three areas already mentioned). From the 40,000 students from these colleges that WMPIRG estimates will be the main source of funding a budget of $160,000 per year is planned.

A forlorn pirger.

And what about the student? What other benefits can he reap besides having a constant, year-round surveillance on the environment, discrimination, university policies, community needs, etc? Arnold Millette drove home the fact that any student can get credit for the work he does for WMPIRG for a course in which WMPIRG work is connected: "This is a chance for students to get credits for something they enjoy doing, and, in the end they will have something that will not sit in a box somewhere but will be read and evaluated for action."

Okay. So WMPIRG looks pretty safe structurally but how about the action side of it? How do they stand up to the things that Nader has said they should direct themselves towards? And what about the way in which they present themselves to the public eye?

In Nader's "manual" he stresses the need for PIRGs to look in all directions to investigate. Right now, Allen Yelsey, who heads research, has about sixty students working on problems for investigation. Several operations they are taking part in are court-watching in Chicopee, and research on rural poverty. Their research, by the way, is earning them academic credits. And of course there has been research done on the Montague Plain Landfill.

WMPIRG has devoted its first two columns in POOR RICHARD'S to the controversy involved with the landfill they insist that "we have been keeping on the outskirts of the Montague thing." What they have done then is to use this controversy as a boost to their campaign to gain the attention and support of the campus at large. "We are not elected, so, right now we are making no policies," Allen Yelsey said. The fact remains that both articles contained a visually biased perspective of the controversy. The first article contained a picture of a waste-strewn stream with the heading "landfill more bad than good?" It is certainly true that "we cannot afford the economy of landfill" as Dr. Robert Livingston, ecologist in the Botony Dept. put it. On the other hand he also realizes that if landfill is the only viable solution for the disposal of refuse then it had better be put into operation. The second article contained a four column cartoon depicting the Western Mass citizen being run over by the money-grubbing B&M Railroad. The article itself contained faults that bordered on emotional harangue. For example, the idea that a landfill should not be set up in Montague because the garbage comes from Boston and not from Montague is the kind of blind emotionalism that WMPIRG should watch out for. What about the Amherst landfill off route 9 that is within three miles of the town's water supply? There is no outcry about the dangers there.

I think that what this kind of confusion about policies points to is a general confusion and lack of communication that is only normal in the beginning stages of such a vast enterprise. The reader may have gotten the impression that this EMPIRG report has oscillated between pro and con while trying to put forth certain facts about the WMPIRG presence on campus.

What may have seemed like indecision to take a stand was, in fact, an expose of the different sides of this new phenomenon that has hit the western part of the state (there is also an EMPIRG in the process of development in the eastern part of the state; the division of the state into two PIRGs makes for more concentrated action, by the way). The very idea of PIRGs is an idealistic thought if ever there was one. Looking critically at it then is a way to guard yourself from the hurt that has resulted from the failure of by-gone idealisms. It is in the students of this country that Nader places his faith for success of PIRGs. The hope is that finally, there will come from the idealistic spirit a concrete, productive, working organization that is the embodiment of that spirit.

Teaching An Old Running Dog New Tricks

By FRANK BAGLIONE

There was a time in the Roman Empire when a madman held the title of Emperor. He built a birdge from his home to a temple so that he could be a neighbor to the gods, and he once nominated his horse for consul. He reigned only a few years, and when his bizarre reign ended some people, looking for something positive to say about the period, were encouraged by the fact that the large empire had been able to survive the administration of a demented emperor. It not only survived but functioned properly.

When Richard Nixon ascended to the presidency of the American Empire in 1968 there were many who felt that with such a man in the nation's highest office our system would not survive, or, in the least, would cease to function properly. It was, after all, the year in which this nation changed its mind on the latest attempt to block the advance fo communism. Fed by this fact, it was the year in which those seeking a second American Revolution gathered their greatest strength. A tremendous social revolution was gathering; the nation's economic system was stretched taut; threats of an ecological disaster had begun to be heard; the largest political party in the country had been assaulted; the drug culture was peaking; liberation movements abounded. And Richard Nixon seemed to be the man who could only aggravate these sores.

Yet America is not a nation to be trifled with, not by the Black Panthers, not by SDS (remember them), not by the parasitic offspring of the middle class who were secure and comfortable enough to be bored, not by ecological prophets of the apocalypse, not by unwashed drop-outs. America is a great and impersonal sponge--push against it and it gives way, throw yourself against it and it absorbs you. If only for the incredible way it changes its form and remains the same, if only for its utter disregard of threats for immediate change, we must stand in awe, overcome with respect.

Richard Nixon did not aggravate the nation's sores, he numbed them. Nixonism is an overpowering anesthetic, a down, to some, a bummer. Whatever, with a benign neglect of the black civil rights movement he cut the impetus to create turmoil in that area by withdrawing government concern. In 1972 we find the Congress passing anti-bussing bills that should seriously slow the process of school integration. With de-escalation and Vietnamization he made the end of the Vietnam war a matter of patience (which is a virtue). In 1972 we find America firmly committed to total withdrawal and ready to talk about the end of Thieu, and a coalition government. Anti-war groups find themselves with useless picket signs. The government is making corporations move toward meeting anti-pollution standards; Nixon says amnesty for war resisters can be considered after the troops and POWs come home. And the government's stand against the legalization of marijuana is as suspect as was its stand, its firm stand, against wage and price controls. The opposition is continually crashing after its pre-Nixon high.

Perhaps everyone underestimated Mr. Richard Nixon, that "out-of-time man" who looked at 1968 through 1952, that man who thought and spoke like the lamest of the lames. For nearly four years we have stood stunned at the way he bumbled his way through every catastrophe--Haynesworth and Carswell; the Cambodian "incursion" (how lovely he uses the English language); the battle with the labor unions; the defeat in the U.N. over Nationalist China--and still managed to come up smelling like a rose. Even when Richard Nixon stepped off the plane in Peking and the "peoples' revolutionary band" standing behind Chou En-lai struck up the "Star Spangled Banner"!!!! could most people believe our president fully realized or planned the coup he had engineered.

Chou-En--Lai greets President Nixon during his recent China visit. "How was it that America's number one champion against communism should journey so far into the enemie's camp and the only tangible diplomatic result of the visit is America's pledge to withdraw its troops from Taiwan?"

This is why Nixon is infallible. We expect segregation and we get a mild, benign neglect. We expect a Vietnam war of attrition and get American withdrawal and concession. We expect unbridled capitalism and wake up to a frozen economy. And we expect a Kennedy or a McGovern to thaw the cold war only to find Richrd Nixon shaking Mao Tse-tung's hand. As a CBS correspondent remarked, the message is clear--you can teach an old running dog new trucks.

Nixon in China was spectacular. True, by comparison to the gentle looking little Chou En-lai, our president's lack of grace in speaking and his unsure grasp of a courteous demeanor was apparent. And yet there he was making a trip of greater impact than the journey to the moon (also accomplished in his term of office). If he was not the most pleasing and affable ambassador he nonetheless displayed a graciousness and taste that seemed beyond his ability in the past.

The results of Nixon's trip were greater than seeing a U.S. president strolling along the Great Wall, or watching the First Lady perform the duties of a somewhat awkward ambassador of good will. In Chou En-lai's expressing China's desire to seek a normalization of relations with the United States, in Nixon's unhesitating concessions to China's foreign policy wishes. . .here were the amazing results of the president's trip to China. How was it that America's number one champion against communism should journey so far into the enemy's camp and the only tangible diplomatic result of the visit is America's pledge to withdraw its troops from Taiwan? Old Chaing Kai-chek the right wing's dream of recapturing the Chinese mainland for the forces of good, deserted by an old friend, a friend who had pledged to defend Taiwan's off-shore islands back in 1960 when a young Massachusetts' senator ahd said they were not worth fighting for. It may be that there is no "new Nixon," that one's character cannot be changed, but what we have here is a Nixon whose behavior has certainly been modified. It is a Nixon that walks smoothly and cunningly between the changing worlds.

After four years of Nixon we find the United States still solvent, still powerful, still a nation whose sins are not so great after all--after Czechoslovakia, after Northern Ireland, after Pakistan. It is difficult for any nation to cast a single stone. At home we found the idealistic young were not above bloodying their hands either; Nixon's attempts to save face in Indochina by refusing demands for an immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops did not justify bombings where innocent people could be (and were at Madison) killed by the terrorist's bomb. Social injustices do not allow for the random killing of policemen. Occasional malfunctions and lags in the society were hardly sufficient provocation for the shrill and hysterical speech and actions of morally aggressive radicals. In many cases where Nixon's conduct was little more than mediocre and hollow, the conduct of others made him seem the epitome of honesty and good, solid, common American sense.

As said before, there were those who believed a few years of Nixon-Mitchell conservatism and "repression" would expose the "corrupt capitalist system" for the "Fascist racist state" that it was, in their minds, and lead to a revolution of the people, by the people, and for the people, so to speak. As of this writing, this has not happened. While there will always be a number of odd-balls who mind the store while the revolution is postponed, it should be evident to most by now that the system has accepted just about all the change it can tolerate at this moment. Indeed, there are some indications that in some areas a normal and limited reaction, or counter-revolution if you must, is taking place. It is happening in civil rights most obviously--that particular question has been with us some time now. The process should continue in other areas soon. If Nixon did not bring us together, he certainly did show us how to relax.

It should be safe to say that few found Nixon's first term in office exhilirating, he does not practice the politics of joy. But he showed himself to be a man of ability, resourcefullness, inventiveness, strength and luck (if you will not allow him judgement). He earned people's respect by doing more than was expected of him, and doing it rather well. He earned his share of the people's respect by standing up to the hysterics, the ridicule, the threats, the vicious and sometimes frenzied derision. He held up under the pressure of his job, a situation most Americans have themselves experienced and appreciate. And he lasted; he is not only going to cross the finish line, but he seems to be doing it coming on strong, with good style and showing little fatigue. Richard Nixon seems to be on the verge of outlasting his opponents, and that includes the press who thought they weren't going to have Dick Nixon to kick around anymore.

Richard Nixon has handled his four years in office well. The metaphors and imagery of football plays in which he speaks to describe his government's handling of certain problems is quite accurate. He has been a good coach and has trained a fine team. Each player has his specialty, each man makes the runs, or blocks, or tackles with precise timing. Or like the President's other favorite metaphor, each flank of his forces moves up on command; every fight, every skirmish, every pitched battle is timed and executed to precision. His most impressive weapon is the way he uses surprise. How many times have we believed he was to be run from the field--in Supreme Court nominations, in the economy, in the Vietnam War, in the battles over his two China policy--only to find that he snatched victory from his foes each time. The Supreme Court does look more conservative, he has executed his foe's remedies for the economy, the war dwindles, two Chinas seem to be one.

And now we come upon the battle for re-election. From the looks of his splintered opposition, from the proliferation of lunatic third party candidates, from the way he has timed and handled his recent travelling, who seems to be the most representative candidate? Richard Millhouse Nixon is the only man running as himself, taken for whatever that is worth. Only Muskie of all his opposition looks anything like a representative American candidate. We have people running as anti-war candidates, as anti-bussing candidates, as communists, as socialists, as conservatives. We have a black woman to understand the blacks and women; we have a big city mayor to understand the urban problems; we have all kinds of candidates with their own personal hussle. But where is the man running as himself? Where is the candidate with wide identity but lacking the desire to shove a particular ideology down our throats?

Richard Nixon is such a man. This is not an easy thing to say at a time when every editor of a college newspaper is personally calling down the president, when every comic finds his only salvation in ridiculing him, when nearly our entire intelligentsia snobbishly derides this homely man, and we are all familiar with the knowing smiles that appear on the words "Tricky Dick." No doubt even shoe-shine boys can give you five minutes on the indignities of having Richard Nixon as our president. Yet though this be the case, we should be able to recognize an amazing feat of survival if nothing else. We should be large enough to admit that we have been disconcerted by Nixon's ability to give the lie to our constant depreciation of his policies. Richard Nixon may not be the man we all vote for (certain forces forbid such a thing in the state which gave the world John and Robert Kennedy), but certainly fair minded people can at least appreciate the fact that we have all grossly underestimated the man. And it should be that if we cannot give him our support, we can at least give him our hand.

Perhaps for one moment before the real heat of the campaign begins, that camp which has such great pretentions to morality, hunanism and peace can stoop to find some small bit of humanity in Richard Nixon, and then continue to try and tear him to shreads lest they be forced to suffer his presence another four years.

Lindsay: The Great Urban Hope

By JOAN GHIRALDINI

John Lindsay served ten years in Washington, in both the executive and legislative branches of the Federal government, and he found life there relatively sedate.

"It's pretty easy to make speeches, throw bills in the hopper, and cast votes," he said recently to a group of the Massachusetts State House Press Corps Association.

"But any single week as mayor of New York, confronting crime, disease and stunted lives, confronting the same reality I have seen in dozens of towns and cities and suburbs, has taught me more about America than all my years in Washington," Lindsay claimed.

And that experience as mayor of New York for the past six years is what distinguishes John Lindsay's presidential candidacy from the five Democratic senators vying for the party's nomination.

For the last 40 years, since the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt, every President with a political background has come from Washington, as does every major Democratic contender this year.

"I believe it is again time America sent a President to Washington instead of letting Washington send a President to us," Lindsay stated when he announced last December he was entering the March 14 Florida Primary.

"It is time for a President who has seen and felt first hand the anguish of imposed scarcity, who has been forced to chose between teachers in our schools and doctors in our hospitals, between cleaning our rivers and caring for our sick, because the funds we need are drained away into a mindless wars and into pockets of the few", he said.

Lindsay has held the job of governing New York since 1966, a period during which the urban centers in this country first began to feel the crises that Washington has failed to meet.

Some call the job of New York Mayor the "second toughest" in the country. And for good reason. There are some 300,000 employees, serving a city as large as Chicago, Los Angeles, Boston, Miami, and Houston combined. No other candidate for President can match that experience in solving the problems of under the tremendous pressures that go along with the modern urban crises.

Some people say John Lindsay has failed as mayor of New York. But the fact is he has been one of the city's most successful mayors, fighting some of the toughest problems ever to face any American city. There is a long list of accomplishments of the Lindsay Administration. Here are some of them:

—Under the Lindsay Administration, New York City has had one of the lowest unemployment rates of any major city in the country, and lowest joblessness among minority groups.

—John Lindsay created the city's first full-time Office of the Aging. His special tax relief program helped 14,000 elderly keep their homes while special rent exemptions spared 30,000 elderly tenants from rent increases.

—To stimulate the economy in the ghettoes, he had $8 million in city funds deposited in ghetto banks.

—Under the Lindsay administration, the number of day care children in New York has doubled. Lindsay also initiated Family Day Care, which enables welfare mothers to work.

—John Lindsay returned the city's parks and streets to people. He closed the major parks and some streets to traffic and sponsored a wide range of cultural, educational, and sports activities— from Philharmonic Concerts to art shows to bike races.

—John Lindsay restructured New York's health care system into a public benefit corporation, with 18 hospitals serving the needs of individual communities.

—The Lindsay administration also decentralized New York's 1 million pupil school systems, shifting control from a nine-member board to 31 locally elected boards with responsibility for local schools.

—Lindsay established the first Department of Consumer Affairs in the country and appointed Bess Myerson to head it.

—John Lindsay as a spokesman for the American cities, has publicly opposed the Vietnam War since 1965. He has seen money desperately needed by the cities wasted in Vietnam and spoken out.

The list of Lindsay's accomplishments can go on for a lot longer, but in the job of mayor of any big city you take a lot of heat for what you do and there's no buffer between you and your constituents. You listen to people whether you like or not. You hear about their day to day life and death struggles for jobs, decent housing, for safe streets, for clean air. Nobody stands between you and the facts.

That's what John Lindsay has had to do in New York and he has met that challenge with courage. When the streets of Harlem were ready to flare up in the hot summer nights of the 1960's, Mayor Lindsay went into the neighborhoods and talked to the people. And he has been bold enough to sharply criticize Nixon's much-heralded trip to China, claiming the president is more willing to travel to China "but not to Harlem or Watts or Appalachia. . .to the places where Americans wait for help."

He has stood up before the generally conservative Florida Legislature, a state where George Wallace is expected to top the primary ticket. And unequivocally spoke out for busing of school children—"because the alternative of perpetuated racial segregation is worse, far worse," he said.

Last month, Lindsay went into Rep. Louise Day Hicks' district in South Boston and talked about "the darker kind of destiny, a destiny of sorrow and suffering and needless. . . death that links us all from what happened at Kent State to what's happening in Vietnam and Derry."

John Lindsay

One woman in the audience later complained that the mayor should have stayed on his intended topic- civil rights in Northern Ireland and not discussed Kent State and Jackson State and Vietnam.

But her husband a retired policeman, disagreed. "I like the way he brought out about the blacks and the way Washington is being too tyrannical," he told Judith Michaelson of the New York Post.

In Florida, John Lindsay has been the only candidate to meet the threat of George Wallace head on. On January 21, he challenged the Alabama Governor to a statewide television debate. Wallace backed down.

He has stated throughout his campaign in Florida that Wallace stands for "everything that's wrong" with America, a statement that does not lie well with the large percentage of voters that Wallace is believed to have.

On Vietnam, Lindsay has consistently opposed the war since 1965 and refuses now to let the Nixon Administration off the hook for perputating the killing in Indochina under the guise of winding down the war.

"It doesn't take an eight point plan, or a four point plan or a 2 point plan, . . .(to end the war). That takes only a one point plan: Bring all the troops home now," he told a gathering of 1,500 students at Northeastern University on Feb. 3.

On civil right and civil liberties, on women's rights, on the problems of minorities and the poor, on the amount of military spending, — John Lindsay has been on the forefront of liberal causes.

But it's the thrust and emphasis of his candidacy that allow him to stand apart from the other Democrats in the race. Boston City Councillor John Joseph Moakley, announcing his endorsement of the mayor, called Lindsay the "urban warrior". And for people like Moakley who have fought the battles of urban crises and know that that is where the priorities of this country must be focused, John Lindsay's candidacy is allowing the electorate to respond to those problems.

When announcing his intention to run in his state, the mayor termed the primary critical to his future presidential plans. He plans to bring his candidacy to as much of a cross section of Democratic voters as possible,— to the retired policeman in South Boston, to the students of the University of Massachusetts.

". . .I'm not going to win and you're not going to win," he told that group of Northeastern students, "if we bicker over who's further to the left or plan tactics to get closer to the middle. We're only going to win if all those people who this administration has slammed the door on get together. We're going to win when the unemployed technician on Route 128 starts talking to the Welfare mother in Roxbury— because this administration had kept them both from working."

American Society Defined In 5,000 Cliches And More

Part Two: The Five Thousand Cliches, and More

By DONALD D. ROBADUE, Jr.

It just may be pretty bleak out there in the working world. Have you been thinking of all those faceless organization men and women in mechanical offices doing mechanical tasks, and how you'll be one of them? Chances are you haven't, and maybe its time you did. Unless, of course, you shelled out $1.95 for a paperback copy of Charles Reich's fantastic money making success The Greening of America, in which he not only tells of Consciousness III, love, togetherness, and nonprofits, but he made a bundle to boot. Then you won't have to think at all, because you are part of Consciousness III, the New Generation, and you are where it's all at.

That's right, friend. There is nothing out there for us at all. It's bad and ugly and organized and profit making. But we're poor, with no responsibilities, we're together, some of us are doing dope, we live on rock music, we love each other, we're honest, and we know what's going on. And we're going to change America with our new consciousness.

What's the matter? You mean you don't feel like you know what the hell is coming off, and you wish that you did have some purpose? Nonsense! Charles Reich really knows what we're up to: "Young people today insist upon prolonging the period of youth, education, and growth. They stay uncommitted; they refuse to decide on a formal career, they do not give themselves fixed future goals to pursue."

Maybe that is what we're doing, but I doubt that it is voluntary. It is only the infants among us that aren't frustrated by the state of suspended adolescence that we are in. One can live in a dorm for just so long before one reaches the point where it becomes a growth and maturity retarding environment. Have you ever wondered what happens to you when you become a senior? And seniors, do you know what is happening to you? I think it has something to do with finding a job and giving up the friendly dorm community and stereo music all day and night. I suspect that it is a quick rush of air out a door, and then a whole new way of life on the other side, once the door has slammed shut. It makes one wonder about the strength of the Truths one used to believe in college. A few years after that it is nostalgia on the wonderful days at UMass, marriage and children, and soon enough you'll be dead.

These things are cliches, but they also make up a large part of the lives we will lead past the age of 21. (Life does exist behind then.) The Greening of America takes our university lives as the standard of a new way of life and a new 'consciousness' of the world consisting of spring days and rock festivals that, it maintains, will last forever. The book gives a glowing account of the thoughts, feelings, and intentions so dear to us students and turns it into a vision of perpetual adolescence.

Reich is a good astrologer: his conception of the New Generation (us), contains something for every student who needs self assurance that he is O.K. and that the screwed up mess he is living has a mystical-intellectual justification. Reich spends five pages explaining the importance of our clothes, twelve pages on the importance of music, but less than one page on careers and work. After all, that is the proportion of energy that we spend on the three items.

It is easy to understand why page after page of the book is loaded with ignorance, misinterpretation, and fantasy about the economy, so-called class distinctions, social problems, and the direction our society is heading. That is because it mirrors our fantasies, ignorance, and growing pains about the society. We don't like to be evaluated and to compete, not because of an intellectual stance, but because we are lazy and incompetent. In support of our feeling, Reich attacks the meritocracy system and says that everyone should be accepted for what they are, and shouldn't be made to feel inferior. Feeling inferior is what getting a job only on merit does to the flunkeys and incompetents who didn't make the grade. (Massachusetts state government is years ahead of its time in accepting zeroes and incompetents into its ranks). I'd not care to go to a doctor or have a lawyer who was given his license so as not to hurt his feelings, even though he flunked his exams.

Reich says that all the money that is in the private sector of the economy is being spent on luxury goods, and that it should go to the poor, and to build new housing. This can be done with a change in the consciousness of the middle classes that gorge themselves with the results of our affluence. He, like many of us young reformers, seems to forget, if he ever knew, that if products aren't produced to be sold, then the money doesn't exist. Money isn't a magical substance that people seem to have a lot of by working at imaginary jobs having nothing to do with production or services. It exists because people are producing it through products and labor and mainly through capital investment, which is the seed of the production of new money. If there is no production or purchase of the middle class man's 'material goods', there is no money to put in anybody's pocket, let alone the poor's.

Reich's brand of 'revolution' turns out to be the latest version of a century old myth, the class conflict theory of Marx. Marx, as you know, is quite in vogue among intellectuals, mainly because he makes no sense at all anymore, and intellectuals go for things like that. The 'Corporate State' is the catch-all term this time, and also the oppressive bad guy. We, the oppressed, must put human values back into the inhuman bureaucracy that governs us and that has taken over and continues on its own energy, totally out of human control. Remember that last phrase, its important. Reich spends half of his book building up this monolith, only to show how it's crumbling and how everybody is revolting against it and how we will put back in some mysterious thing called 'human values', and make it respond to 'human needs'. This is done, not through individual action and utilization, but through something more 'human'. This comes off if you are willing to believe that bureaucracy is 'inhuman' and unnatural. If you have had the typical set of student nightmares, you'll accept it.

But if you ever gave it any thought, you'll see that bureaucracy and organization is as inhuman as music, art, literature, gardens, clothing, and houses. Man creates and maintains every one of them, so where is the inhumanity? Oh, it's not that kind of humanity, you say, it's the kind one learns in college. It's the real humanities like poetry and sunny days and getting together and love and peace. Bureaucracies have no pity, respect, kindness, or forgiveness for just existing and wanting service, or for incompetence and lethargy. They are harsh and 'scientific'. But the fact of the matter is that they are human. In the end all Reich says is that we should combine both aspects, which is certainly a cheery and sensible position, but hardly the basis for a Marxist brand revolution.

Consciousness III consists of one giant class of humans rebelling in a nonpolitical, nonviolent, and nonaction way against the oppressor class, which happens to be a collection of organization blueprints used to get things done or to preserve existing practices and policies, good or bad. It is a revolt not against technology, but against everything that humans do to make use of technology. It wants the harvest of science and industry, but without the nasties that offend and outrage the humanists, such as organization, efficiency, competence, and competition. They see the corruption, incompetence, inefficiency, unresponsiveness, and robbery that goes along with organization as faults of the system, not human weakness.

We want music, for example. Music is the heart of the New Generation, says Reich, so he spends twelve pages on the meanings of our favorite songs. But the story behind our music is full of bloodthirsty competition, corruption, money and more money, technology, vinyl whose production fills our air with deadly hydrocarbons, electronics, and giant corporations whose hierarchies repress and dehumanize.

But this is a revolution of consciousness only, so we can buy technology and support the vultures and the dehumanization economically while we groove on the Stones with our $500 stereos smoking Mafia dope, and sitting around believing in ourselves. We don't have to actually act against environmental damage that we and others do, nor act against government stupidity and misdirection, or take any real political action against what we may hate about what the government does, or in favor of what we like about it.

To quote him: "Most of the Consciousness III people are notably unaggressive, nonviolent, uninterested in the political game, absorbed by their culture, and its possibilities and mainly ask to be left alone. . .There is nothing worse than having to forego a beautiful outdoor day in order to attend a meeting."

We don't have to be selective consumers and not support the 'Corporate State' with what it runs on, our dollars. We don't have to say a word. We just keep on doing what we're doing, turn our parents onto rock music, togetherness, and sunny days, just like they had in their youth, and tell them they don't have to work eight hours a day.

In the meantime we are forced to drop out of school, that is, Consciousness III, because our parents finally realized that it was a waste of their lives to work hard to keep us in school when they could be grooving instead. So then we have to find a job, grubbing for money and ending up too pooped and hungry to enjoy the fruits of Consciousness III. It's time for some of our parents to do that anyway, but the question is, what then of our philosophy? Go ask Charles Reich, maybe he knows. Better yet if you get frantic enough, ask a psychiatrist, and in that way support the new intellectual class that produces books like Greening of America.

No doubt we need a different attitude toward life, one that combines technology and organization with a 'consciousness' of what we are doing and some idea of where our civilization is going. We can't expand industrially and in population in the same way forever, and with the work of groups such as Zero Population Growth and the new awareness of many students and adults of the environment we live in, my hope is that we won't continue on the same course. We need to know the effects and costs of our expansion. The knowledge economy demands training of us that puts us in a position to know about more than just a single-minded area of study. The university is there, if we care to use it.

There are two basic approaches, maybe more, that one can take toward the university experience. There is the cult of subjectivism, one branch of it led by Reich and Consciousness III. In this approach one feels resentful of having to take any course outside one's major, and in certain cases, resentful of taking any courses at all. Rules, regulations, and laws are oppresive and exist only to torment one. All organizations and hierarchies are inhuman and need to be changed, but one is never quite certain how. Griping and hating are subjectivism's main intellectual activities.

On the other hand, one can make the best advantage of wherever one is and whatever one is doing, providing one is not a POW in a North Vietnam concentration camp. This approach makes the best of what the university has to offer while trying to improve it and suit it to oneself at the same time. Organizations and institutions exist to be exploited to our full advantage. This is nothing new, and sounds rather hateful and imperialistic but that is what making organizations responsive to human (our) needs means.

Campus Aesthetics

Seen Through The Eyes Of The Perverse

By RICHARD DAVIS

"Didn't sit on the toilet long enough this morning? Didn't give it a chance. Patience. Sit, think, create. Gotta walk around all day fulla shit, just no time anymore to let it out, just no time to let it slide out, gotta use those muscles; tighter, harder, harder, so hard it will never come out."

"Walking by the Campus Center with those smelly bowels, no wonder it looks like a waffle. Yesterday's breakfast is still in there; the muscles are so tight they pushed up instead of down. Diagnosis: Ocular Colitis. Prognosis: Good if the muscles loosen up."

"Hey man! What kind of a rap are you layin' on me? You think I don't see those buildings when I walk around all day? I see them. I walk by them every day and I know the guy who planned 'em was the one who was fulla shit. Just look at 'em. The Campus Center, ya that's a far out building; so far out why didn't they leave it out there where it belongs. And that new library. Just what we need; a big prick in the middle of this fuckin' campus. Now Goodell, that's what a library is. Whata we need the Empire State Building to keep all those books for anyway? And did you see that anal extension onto Bartlett? Just a big ugly prolapse rectum for the English and Psych and whatever other people there are in that building to tickle the asses of the jocks over there at Boyden."

"Wait a second man. Calm down. I'm sorry I got you so excited. Is that what you really see when you look at those buildings?"

"Ya. And I see more shit than that too."

"O.K. O.K. But will you listen to me for a second? Didn't mean to come down on you so hard but I'm really pissed off about attitudes like yours. Not that I don't think you're justified, but I see something else. Will ya listen to me for a while? Let me tell you how I feel."

"I'm in a hurry but if ya talk fast I'll listen. C'mon, c'mon let's hear it. I aint' got all day. Hit me with it."

"The Campus Center. A waffle? I can't buy that. You complain about just being a number here, just a little speck that keeps getting pushed under the carpet. Well this building justs reaches out and grabs you and yells "Look at me, I'M an individual. I got four faces and they all have a different expression." That's the personal touch. But then you say why that dull white lifeless concrete. It's the only logical Kali Yuga material. Dig? Wood just doesn't make it anymore and besides we gotta tune into the tree problem. So what is the most abundant material? What reflects the life of the space baby age? And besides did you know that it takes a hundred years for concrete to harden, to come to maturity. It's alive. It waits before it hardens; more than a lifetime. That could teach us a thing or two."

"And then there's the shape of the Campus Center, at least how we see it from the airside. You got a space there in the middle of the campus and Breuer and Berckhard had to do something with it. I think they did something interesting but you gotta sit on your little bowl out there for awhile and think on it. You can get the feeling, you know like that old Gospel inspiration, that those architects carved out a big chunk of air there. That building is solid. I mean it's compact and fits together like a puzzle and you can feel that when the puzzle was put together you couldn't take it apart. Never. And it ain't one a those big puzzles ya gotta spread out over a big table either. It's compact. You really can't say that they were too elaborate, that they were strung out on some dreamy beauty trip. No. They were practical. But I do think they were waking old Noah Webster up a little and making his word beauty fit into their plan. They were making beauty relevant. Ya relevant, you can dig that can't you? And to make beauty relevant they had to change the spelling of the word security so it could be close to beauty in the dictionary. Ya, they had to, because part of that clear light aesthetic blissful aura type projection that comes from that building, you know, what it makes you feel when you look at it, is security. Especially when you look at the sides of the building.

But I gotta give you concrete examples why I see a big baby blanket up there. Well man, I look at the sides and I see this chunk of concrete that says "This is my space. I live here." And like I said, it is compact. It don't reach for the sky. It stays close to the earth and I haven't heard that Chicken Little changed the rap to "The earth is falling!" And you know something else? This compactness idea also makes me think of the word efficiency. Ya, that's a 3000 mile wide patch of land between Europe and Asia. People here really dig efficiency. If they know that this new pill will stop diarrhea instantly, they feel secure. And this Campus Center here just takes up enough space to do what the students want it to do. Why those architects even stayed faithful to their heritage. They kept the stairways toward the outside of the building so people can move around more efficiently inside. Those bulges on the sides of the building; they're stairways that only take up space from the air outside. You know that's cool, that's efficient."

"And the windows. Yeah the windows. They really suck you into that building. They're like a big attraction, just like when the braless look came into fashion. But these windows don't bounce around, they don't get your mind to thinking about little Peter rising down there in Florida. You gotta tune into art for awhile to see what's happening there. Those two sides with the windows; they're functional sculptures. You can see the light when you want, when you look out onto the campus and when you're outside you can dig the sculpture. It's the face of the building, its the personality right there. It's not dull. You got different size windows in different size rows. And the concrete around the windows just isn't flat all the way around. But it isn't silicone that makes the space around the windows interesting; it's the variation in dimension. I mean some windows got slits around them, some got flat borders and then you can see how the windows get sucked in sometimes or just are flat to the surface. You know like that thing there is breathing."

"Then you say to me it just don't fit with the rest of the campus. Well lemmie ask you if the Indians thought that those houses the colonists were building fit into their land. It's a hard question to answer but we just can't be happy with no change. You know how happy your mother is when she gets all that change from a dollar when she buys her aspirin at the new discount patent medicine center. The change has to be made and someone or something has to do it. We got the Campus Center to help us see where we're going if we relax the eyelids so they can open."

"You're a real fuckin' turkey. I think you're crazy. You expect me to stand here and listen to anymore of this shit? You must be puttin' me on. You're doin' a Psych experiment, right?"

"No I'm for real. Please just listen a little more."

"Well I guess if you are serious I betta listen, 'cause if you don't get all of that shit out of you you'll probably explode pal. Hit me with some more."

"Good I'm glad you'll listen. I have a little more to say. I've been thinking about that new library lately; the one you called a big prick. I guess it is a big prick, but not one from a man but an animal. You know, more function and less pleasure. Dig? I've been looking at the floor plans for it and I think what's happening on the inside is more important than what's happening on the outside. Like when a woman's pregnant you see her get fat around the bread basket but you keep thinking that all kinds of amazing things are happening inside. But that big belly is interesting too. It's a simple curvy shape and you can even find a little bit of Nirvana in that simplicity. You know it's easy to understand and that's like the outside of that new library. You got a rectangle that goes straight up for 28 stories and since it's a long trip for the eyes maybe Mr. Stone the architect put those red bricks there so he wouldn't be hit with any law suits for hypnotizing any people. The color keeps your eyes in the ball game. And since he has a little more control of the surface than the pregnant woman has over her outside belly shape, he threw in some snub nose triangles goin' up the sides, just to show that maybe there's even hope for the old ancient rectangle."

"But I hear everybody say "The building's so big. It don't look like a library." What's a library supposed to look like anyway? Maybe if we had more room on the campus they could spread out this big bedroom for the books and make everybody know they were looking at a library. But you gotta realize that we only got so much space on the earth. It's just as easy to get pregnant in a twenty second story apartment as it is on your own 200 acre piece of land. That's where it's at. We gotta remember the space is going fast and the architect's gotta be "sensitive" to that."

"So he solves the problem of taking up too much space right off. You won't see the campus cops giving parking tickets to any buildings; at least not for awhile anyway. Now this dud Stone stops worrying about the outside and puts all his energy into the inside. You know like Superman who can transcend the material problems of the universe right before your eyes."

"Wait a second man. You're really flippin' out now. Slow down. Cool your fuckin' head off. Take it easy."

"I'm sorry. I got a little wound up. Let me continue. So now I got Stone diggin' on the inside of his library. He starts talkin' to himself. "I gotta make it interesting but I gotta remember that dollars per square restriction. People gotta move around in the building easy and I gotta stick all those damned books in good places." What happens next? After a lot of nightmares and wet dreams old Stone man sits down at his table and lays the practical architect rap to his drawing board. You students and assorted others are gonna have a fountain surrounded by plants and flowers on the main floor of the building. Dig it. A little bit of nature on the inside for a change just to help you digest your yogurt and brown rice a little better. It'll be a first for this campus. Then there's the rest of the building. I don't know what the book storage problem is like but I trust this school enough (I hope I'm not being too naive) so that I think the library people worked out their book storage situation with Stone so that all the book people on campus can feel that their friends are resting comfortably."

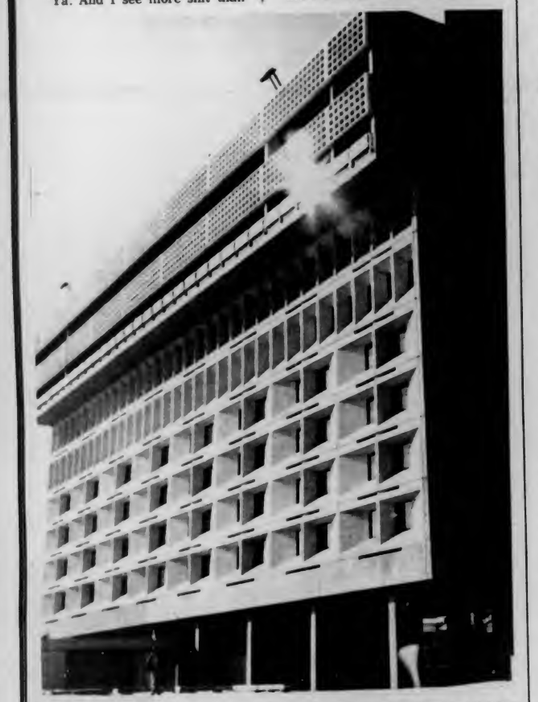
"Now movin' around in the building. You gotta think a that. In Goodell you drive your own chariot: you go where you want when you want. But in the new place you gotta depend on the relatives of Mr. Otis' baby. So the period of the intellectual gladiator on this campus is gonna die. We're gonna have to learn to depend on our technology. The elevators are gonna be like the baby's nipple. They're gonna have to nurse us into this new age, but we gotta feel secure sucking on em. I hope they come through with the goods. And we're gonna have five big nipples to carry the load. If you don't wanna be breast fed, if you don't wanna rework some of your old oral hangups, then you can use the stairs. They're well planned and designed but you'll only be sucking wind while you're trying to find that book and cursing to yourself about those new-fangled ideas in buildings."

"So do you have anything to say now? You listened O.K. but I didn't hear you say anything. What do ya think?"

"I don't know. Maybe I really didn't really look at those buildings the way you did. I guess what you say isn't all shit."

"You know that new building, Tobin Hall? What about it? Do you still think that it's just a prolapse rectum?"

"Ya I still do, but I think I see more too. But I don't even know what they're goin' to use it for, how could I talk about another man's prolapse rectum?"

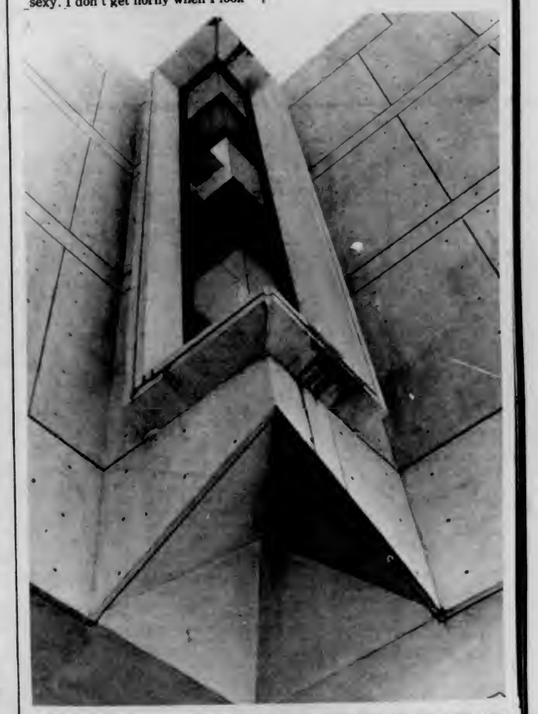


"That's allright, just tell me what's there besides the prolapse rectum."

"Well here goes. But I still think you're a little fuckin' crazy, but maybe you'll feel better if I play your game with you for awhile. Ya know I think I saw that living sculpture you were talking about in the Campus Center. Ya, but Tobin Hall's different. The two long sides with all the windows there, they're all the same size but they ain't boring to me because they breathe like you said. They're sucked into the building. I like that idea. And the cement around them is not all flat either, it makes the windows less boring. But that's it, that's all there is just alot of windows and concrete."

"Well there is more there but I think you're learning to see more things. What about those stairways on the front and back and the walkway around the building that connects them? It reminds me of a Greek temple a little bit but it's sorta like seeing Charlton Heston in street clothes. It looks strange at first but you know everything's cool; he does fit into the 1970's. And ya know something else? I think Tobin Hall's a very sexy building."

"I guess I haven't helped you. You've flipped."



"No. Wait a second, just listen. Let me tell you why I think it's sexy. I don't get horny when I look at it but the idea of it is sexy from my viewpoint. You got a middle part of that building; that's the body. And it's separated from its legs by those columns that look like they don't want the body to get together with the legs. The building isn't reaching up high but looks like it's reaching back for the earth. Except the columns won't let the body get into motion with the legs. If the columns weren't there the body could fall down on its belly and move in on Mother Earth. And what kinda things do you do in a position like that? But Tobin Hall doesn't grab you as quickly as the Campus Center unless I guess you can think of some perversions like me. But it's not in the middle of the campus and doesn't have to be such a showpiece. It's in a little peripheral area and can be a little more subtle than the Campus Center. One more thing about Tobin, just as a parting shot. The corners are pretty sexy too. I gotta say this even though my Women's Liberation type conscience says it's a no-no. Those corners of the building are like bellows that let it breathe, but I'm also diggin' the way they used those triangles to make the corners. Sometimes they make a shadow inside the crevice where they meet. That's the mystery of the crotch that this age has eliminated. Maybe the architect still enjoys the mystery of his wife's corners, maybe he was feeling some of that old classical love and beauty when he got to setting his plans down. I can dig that. I'll still let myself take to the nipple if it means I can grow with this new world."

The Campus Center. "It's compact and fits together like a puzzle and you can feel that when the puzzle was put together, you couldn't take it apart."

The Library. "What do we need the Empire State Building to keep all those books for anyway?

Tobin Hall: "It reminds me of a greek temple a little bit but its sorta like seeing Charleston Heston in streetclothes."

Some Fine Old Vintage

By MIKE KOSTEK

(In The West–Jimi Hendrix-Reprise 2049)

What we have here, friends, are some highlights from three Hendrix concerts: some fine old vintage stuff from one in San Diego (with Noel Redding on bass); more cuts from the May 30th, 1970 Berkeley concert (cf. Rainbow Bridge's "Hear My Train A-Comin' "); and some stuff from his last performance at the Isle of Wight Festival.

The Facts: Personnel: Jimi Hendrix, guitar and vocals. Mitch Mitchell, rampant drums. Billy Cox, bass (Berkely & Wight), and Noel Redding, bass (San D.). So we've got Jimi with his original three-man Experience-maker format, and here we gooo. . . .

Rap intro (Isle of Wight is the scene) and Jimi comes out sounding really enthusiastic, and exhorts the audience to "stannup fo' yore cuntry, an' start singin' " and then presents them with a hardly viable alternative to singing. Then into "The Queen" (British National Anthem) keeping it pretty straight, however twisted, and without the feedback intervals found in the Woodstock "Star Spangled Banner". Musical liberties are taken, but it does kick things off well with some nice vibrating notes, and Mitch starts a drum introduction (one of the very few times I've ever heard drums used as a primary instrument in a Hendrix song) and they lurch into –surprise!– "Sergant Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band". This is a rollikng, extremely loose version that doesn't catch in any niche; the important thing here is not how he did it (fuzzily), but rather the simple fact that he did indeed perform it. One note of interest: it sounds like he sings, "I'd like to introduce to you/ The one and only Billy Shit," but my friend Joff, who should know, says it's only his accent and not his peculiar sense of humor, se he really is saying "Billy Shears." We hear Sgt. Pepper end, then they blow into the beginning of "Spanish Castle Magic", but FADE. . .and come up into—

Jimi Hendrix

"Little Wing". One of Jimi's most gorgeous songs, this from San Diego, and he plays it almost straight from Axis: Bold As Love. It is really nice to hear Jimi play the complicated intro and gently enhance the song with some nice wah-wah at the end. Derek and the Dominoes tried hard with their version, but nobody can add to the awesome simplicity of "Little Wing", and even Eric Clapton and Duane Allman together don't equal Hendrix's playing here. This one song makes all the pompous platitudes of pretentious groups like the Moody Blues and King Crimson seem really ridiculous in comparison.

"Little Wing" ends, and "We call this the blues and we call this one 'Red House'," Jimi says. What follows is a thirteen minute tour de force of blues guitar playing. Clear, crisp, clean, always inventive and innovative, Hendrix has never before played such a long blues number on record. His vocals, as always, add another instrument in the song, and here he sings with feelin.

Flip over to side two – Berkeley. "We'd like to do a loose jam type of thing. I dunno, 'Johnny B. Goode', what the hell." And with Chuck Berry's immoral guitar riff they shoot into this classic. And it moves. It cooks. Yes, dear friends, it ROCKS! This is what Johnny Winter and countless others have tried to do, but only Jimi succeeds in updating this warhorse with his own unique guitar playing. The vocal is blurred and frenzied, but this only adds to the power and impact of it all.

Applause,

Then right into something called "Lover Man" which is almost identical to "Rock Me, Baby" as found on the Hendrix-Redding Monterey album. However, "Rock Me, Baby" is credited to B.B. King and Joe Josea, while Jimi now gets credit for "Lover Man", the same tune with new lyrics. Anyway, "Lover Man" is not played as hard and as fast as "Rock Me, Baby" but is still a nice job. FADE

A mumbled introduction by Jimi as Ed Sullivan and then a strange riff version of "Blue Suede Shoes". Some nice guitar, but the song never really gets going. A poor ending, as either Jimi fades or is faded out, and then the clapping fades in. Rank.

Directly we go to "Voodo Chile" (as it reads on the label and the cover). This is a pretty staid and almost casual run-through, with none of the firey emotion of the "Voodoo Chile" on the Live At L.A. Forum bootleg, which really sears with energy. At Woodstock, Jimi announced "Voodoo Chile" as his "new anthem." At Berkley he put too much finesse into it, and it never reaches the sound climax (get it?) that anthems must have, and that the Electric Ladyland and L.A. Forum versions contain. In fact, this rendition doesn't really end, but merely fades weakly out with Jimi chucka-chuckin' away funkily. That's all very nice, but it doesn't fit as the concluding piece on the album. I find the feedback onslaughts of the other versions more satisfying. And that's It.

So now I would like to put the hurts, as it were, on the people who designed the album package. Hendrix in the West? San Diego, Berkely and England? Chure! Western Hemisphere maybe.

Is "Voodo Chile" (usually known as "Voodoo Chile") so named because this version doesn't end, but merely fades out? On the jacket it reads both "Voodo" and "Voodoo", leading the buyer to believe he's getting two songs, one a bizarre version, and the other the real thing.

The song order on the outside and inside of the jacket is all out of order from what's on the record, and what's more, we get individual pictures of Jimi, Mitch and Noel, with no picture of Billy Cox, although he plays bass on five of the eight cuts.

In any case, Hendrix in the West (or wherever) is 40:43 of the best in blues, hard rock, love ballads, you name it, played live in concert (with fine sound quality, and what a relief to hear the drums and bass after those one-mike bootlegs) by the man who blazed musical trails with his guitar that nobody has even begun to follow.

Gentleness With Impact

By GARY GOMES

Yusef Tateef

"The Gentle Giant"

(Atlantic Records)

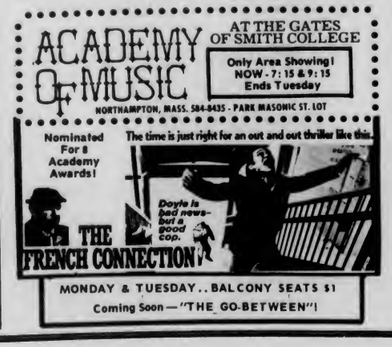
Yusef Lateef has been around the Jazz scene for as long as I can recall. His work in the past has influenced such jazz luminaries as John Coltrane, Pharaoh Sanders and Prince Lasha. While other musicians fooled around with Eastern and mid-Eastern music (like Don Ellis), Lateef has investigated and utilized their conventions years earlier. He, like Art Blakey, was in the forefront of investigating the rhythms of African Music (less than Blakey; this could be explained from the fact that Blakey is a drummer, while Lateef was a reedman). While never a revolutionary of the status of an Archie Shepp or an Ornette Coleman, he was discovering the foundations of the new eclecticism in Black Music and having a profound, if not highly publicized, affect on Black Musicians.

Lateef's new album, Gentle Giant, does not betray Lateef's eclecticism-it has enhanced it. While never being overwhelming technically, his playing reflects wisdom, knowledge, and a profound love for what he's doing. His playing (especially on flute) draws from a great many resources, including Roland Kirk's bluesy rasps, middle Eastern modes, and African chants. These might be included in the course of one solo. Lateef never overbears; his playing is tasty, and taunting, a lick of this, a lick of that, but making sure that the solo comes out as a coherent whole (as any really good musician should).

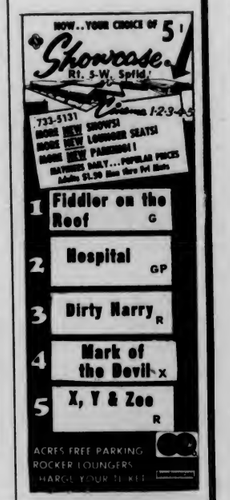
His choice of instruments is fascinating, though not to the degree of exoticism that Roland Kirk is prone to. His selection of instruments on this album are, flute, bamboo flute, pneumatic flute, and oboe (a very difficult instrument to master, seeing as how it's a double reed instrument.) On this album, Yusef concentrates on the flutes to great effect.

The first songs on sides one and two, "Nubian Lady" and "Jungle Plum" are soul-rock, combined with jazz syncopations and accents. On these tracks Lateef is featured laying down some joyful flute-work. "Nubian Lady" shows a gentle flow into different streams of music on the flute over the vibrant undercurrent. The Roland Kirk-like singalong style is employed, with a shift to a mid-Eastern scale, punctuated by Lateef's pauses to breathe or hum the melody (for a wild example of this, listen to Motorhead Sherwood's grunts and snorks interrupting his solo on the Mothers' version of "king Kong" on the "Uncle Meat" LP.) For the most part, these flute performances show a clear tone, and a mature mastery of the instrument, and a thoughtful, contemplative nature about what is being played. The engineering on "Jungle Plum" is excellent, and Lateef's playing wanders from speaker to speaker, jokingly taunting you to follow. These tracks are particularly rewarding over headphones.

One of the delights on this album is the inclusion of Kuumba (Albert) "Tootie" Heath in the proceedings, one of the most consistent musicians I have ever heard. His drumming on the album is consistently strong and tasteful, while not overbearing. On two of the tracks, he plays flute with Lateef. The songs are African inspired (one of them, "Lowland Lullabye" is an African folk tune arranged by Heath). The songs are gentle and plaintive. Back to the roots. I see.



Lateef makes a play for the "younger generation" with "Hey Jude". Or does he? The song features Yusef on oboe and includes singers, and the other players on the cut building up into a controlled cacophany of sound (on "Hey Jude"? Blasphemy!). The song builds, stops for about ten seconds, then comes blasting out again, and just as suddenly stops completely. (Perhaps this explains the warning on the liner notes "DO NOT ADJUST THE PLAYBACK LEVEL ON YOUR AUDIO EQUIPMENT-READJUST YOUR MIND." A worthy sentiment.)



The album closes with three relatively straight numbers. "Queen of the Night" shows some of Lateef's eclecticism, in which he incorporates a European melody over Black rhythms.

The closer of the album is a relatively strange piece called "Below Yellow Bell" ends the album with Lateef doing some smooth and exotic 'scat' singing, proving to be in fine voice and well done.

The album is mellow, but that is a fault as well as an asset. No question about it, Lateef is a fine musician, but although I don't doubt his honesty, much of his work is mellowed to the point of being bland, unlike the mildness implied in his work. Granted, plastic excitement can be much worse. However, this is music that you have to dig into to get something out of, which may be just as well. It is easy on white ears, and could be compared to a succulent steak rather than the spiciness of the work of such people as the Art Ensemble of Chicago or Archie Shepp. It opens new horizons without that much work to do to get into it. It would be an excellent album for pseudo-jazz buffs to turn onto, because it interests without being frightening. Contrasts, colours, and the eclecticism of Lateef's music might be a good vehicle for some of the more timorous souls among us to get into the mood of the heavier Black Music. Not a bad album, and able to stand on its own two feet, but not as adventurous as I would like. But keep on exploring, Mr. Lateef; you've helped pave the way before, and you can do it again.

Again remember, this is only a good jazz album, but it's got ten times the content, thought, quality, and joy of most of the rock you're listening to now. You can quote me on that.

Back To The Real Roots - Osibisa

BY KENNETH SULIN

WƆYAYA–Osibisa–(Decca Records)

In the spring of 1971 an assembly of seven men were noticed in the nooks and crannies of a shabby London theater rehearsing and pampering with their music; later they were to be recognized as a group going by the name of Osibisa. The ingredients of their sound are complex, yet at the same time astonishing; in fact, there is nothing in the music industry today that can compare with the style Osibisa has progressed through, and now, maintained. Yes, they have made it big–big enough so few can question any limit to the authenticity and accuracy of their talent.

Decca records has now released their second album entitled Wɔyaya which proves to be even more magnificent than the first. A brief history of Osibisa may make you realize why they have become so unique. The seven members are all Blackmen–four from Africa, three from the West Indies. They are a representation of the Reggae cult which is England's band of Blacks, having slowly migrated to Britain eventually producing the underbelt of Black music. Many groups have attempted to use the Reggae music as a type of backing sound; however to little avail. Ginger Baker took the greatest interest and consulted the Africans on the use and mannerisms of playing this kind of rhythm, but it just couldn't come naturally. Finally Osibisa occurred; spontaneously breaking into national recognition both in England and, of course, the United States. The music is a direct representation of their native lands. They are screaming warriors, and you may be assured their sound is excellent.

Wɔyaya is not strictly a rock or soul record. It is an improvisation of tribal music closely meshed with content resembling jazz. The combination is extremely complicated; however, the creative sounds are powerful and driving. Osibisa says all this is done "through the spirit of their ancestors" and not for one second will you wonder if it be so.

On stage you may witness something completely unexpected. The excitement and liveliness of the group is brought out at its best here–they are wildmen, uncontrollable ravens dancing, singing, chanting and being overly energetic with each performance. With bulging muscles and thumping bare feet, Osibisa approaches the audience donned in silk garments, earrings and dark glasses. They are voo-doo kings from the word go, frightening yet inspiring. The problem Decca faced was to contain this force on record and with Wɔyaya they have nearly done the job.

The first record, which sold 10,000 copies in London on its first day of release, displayed the music well, but not the attitude. Wɔyaya, on the other hand, has fulfilled both aspects with its profound power and gaiety. The mixing of a bellowing tenor sax, a wailing guitar and a satiated flood of percussion can only show they love their music as much as anything else. With the sound of storms and jungle hysteria, the pulsating drumbeats and stabbing bass lines will echo in your mind–Osibisa is for real, they do not play games. As Wendell Richardson, lead guitarist, puts it, "we have the rhythm of the soul, something nobody can match."

The album's individual selections range from tribal songs to jazzy ones, Osibisa originals to Roland Kirk. The record opens with "Beautiful Seven", displaying a storm's progression only to be overcome with drumbeat and sax. The drum is the major factor in Osibisa and, through their use of percussion, they are able to mysteriously entrance a listener with little effort. It is not by any means an annoying sound, rather a luring one that will have you paying more and more attention upon each listening.

In between songs one may hear soft tribal chants that grow to convulsions, strange talking in a foreign tongue that seldom can be understood and, of course, the sounds of Africa's jungle.

"Move On" is a Wendell Richardson song with an overwhelming guitar piece, playing note for note with Teddy Osei's saxophone. The electric guitar seems hardly an adequate instrument in such music; however, it is an integral part and further separates Osibisa from other groups.

Osibisa see themselves as new musicians and really new. When compared to the likes of Ornette Coleman, or Sun Ra, Loughty Lasisi Amao, saxophonist for the group, replied that that was old music listened to today–"we're new."

Osibisa can move. They can perform to near perfection and, as said so many times before, they are completely unique. Wɔyaya is an album that should be an immediate success. It is incredibly spiritual and won't let you rest a second upon listening.

Garcia Immensely Enjoyable

GARCIA--Jerry Garcia

(Warner Bros. Records)

By STEVE FELD

Coinciding with lengthy articles in Rolling Stone and Playboy Magazine, Jerry Garcia's first solo effort was hardly unexpected. On Garcia, the leader of the Grateful Dead plays all the instruments except drums, and ends up sounding like the names Phil Lesh, Bob Weir, and Pig Pen never existed!

Garcia is a good record. The only difference between this album and a Grateful Dead record is the rich harmonies that were inherent in the Dead's last two studio efforts, Workingman's Dead and American Beauty. Garcia's overdubbed harmonies are effective, if not superb. He has an enchanting voice, one of the finest in contemporary rock. Rather than to warble, scream or shrill, Garcia tends to talk-sing his songs. This type of style is put to its best advantage on songs that try to tell a story or to explain his philosophies. This archetypical bridge connects Garcia's vocal style with that of Bob Dylan. The major discrepancy lies in their roots, Garcia's being blues, Dylan's being folk.

Everything about the album is immensely enjoyable. The album's opener "Deal" is pure Dead, as is "Loser". In contrast to the Dead, they sound stark and you can't help to think of how the Dead could have supplemented them with their harmonies. This is more of a personal gripe than a critical observation, though.

Jerry Garcia

"Bird Bong" has some touches of "Black Peter", from Workingman's Dead, and a little "St. Stephen", from Aoxomoxoa, which was largely Garcia's album. In fact, this album comes across as sounding more like Aoxomoxoa than any other Dead album.

Garcia's main fault lies in its self-indulgence, the most common pitfall for the contemporary solo artist. The risk of musical self-indulgence is considerably multiplied when the musician is working alone. Garcia said in his Rolling Stone interview that he wanted to take full control and see what happens. The result is that "Spidergawd" ends up being another "Revolution #9". Both these electronic cacaphonies reek of self-indulgence, where the musician tries to become an Artist, capital "A".

Preceeding "Spidergawd" are the pulsars of "Late for Supper", a sound effects freak-out like that on side one of Anthem of the Sun, the Dead's second album. This cosmic turn-on exemplifies the San Francisco science-fiction made popular by Paul Kantner on his solo efforts. It ultimately leads to the omnipotent "Don't think".

"EEP Hour" is a refreshing instrumental designed to relax the frenetic pace created by "Late for Supper" and "Spidergawd". It's still in a science-fiction vein, though and has interesting similarities with "Momma Miss America", an instrumental from Paul McCartney's solo debut.

"To Lay Me Down", "Sugaree" and "The Wheel" best show Garcia's musical directions. Filled with expert musicianship and Robert Hunter's (Jerry Garcia's song-writing partner) forever-cryptic lyrics, they are the most popular and the most outstanding on Garcia. "To Lay Me Down" uses the same riff that is on McCartney's "Let It Be", and the song, on the whole, creates an atmosphere similar "Sugaree", meanwhile, has a chunky rhythm guitar that manages to imitate the croaking of a bullfrog. It's a most interesting effect, bringing back memories of other notable guitar work, such as George Harrison's horn-like guitar, and Paul Kantner's solar fuzz-tone. "Sugaree" has instant appeal as Garcia wails "Please forget you knew my name, my darling Sugaree."

"An Odd Little Place" is a piece of music where a piano-drum duet explore free-style music. The two instruments are playing from different charts, two different patterns, and granting a little artistic license, it pulls through. "The Wheel" closes things up in fine fashion for its a stunning song, musically, lyrically, and instrumentally. It is laden with a Phil Spector-type echo and is the most ominous Garcia-Hunter song since "New Speedway Boogie" on Workingman's Dead. "If the thunder don't get you--the lightening will", Garcia warns in a philosophical sense. "The Wheel" aids in understanding the mystifying album cover if just a bit, expressing one's insignificance in the universe and man's mortality.

Garcia is everything we could have hoped for, in the end. Most, if not all the songs, can be related to previous Grateful Dead songs, shedding a different light on what is already one of the most versatile bands around today. What is lacking on Garcia tends not to be the fault of Jerry Garcia, but rather of the band he is in and what it could have offered.

In a time when the solo artist has proven to be alienating and too often disappointing, Jerry Garcia maintains his cosmic equilibrium throughout.

Delight In Rediscovery

By PATRICK SULLIVAN

Made For Each Other

Written for the screen by Renee Taylor and Joseph Bologna directed by Robert B. Bean; starring Joseph Bologna and Renee Taylor.

What this country needs is more movies like Made For Each Other. It is never sweet, neat, saucy; it is fresh, serious, comic. I do not want to antagonize any reader with high flown claims about this film's "comic seriousness." All too often comedies are deprived of their essential vitality by critics who cannot manage to explain or describe why the film is first of all funny. So what I have to say about Made For Each Other had best be read as an afterword to a viewing of the film itself, or as a means of encouraging as thoughtful and responsive a viewing as possible. I think the film can be a very happy event for everyone who sees it, and I highly recommend it.

The leads in the film, Renee Taylor and Joseph Bologna, who also wrote the script, give warm and moving performances as early 30's persons who have not yet found either themselves or someone with whom they can discover real intimacy. The film covers one painful, hilarious, ambiguous week in their lives as they first try to escape from their problems with one another and end up fighting together for the freedom to love. The film also, by means of flashbacks and contemporary collisions with their parents, conveys in both astringent and loving terms the tenacity of family ties and history. Someone coming from this movie and seeing the poster which reads "This is the first day of the rest of your life" might well laugh in wry amazement at the poster's willful naivete. Made For Each Other is a strong and healthy film because it accepts the complicated history of each individual's life.

That complicated history often includes between parent and child love without understanding along with warmth and hostility rendered indistinguishable by the politics of family bonds. The film says in numerous ways that we are and are not our past, and that it's one hell of a struggle to sort out where we really are.

So much of the beauty of the film depends on this imaginative and insightful couple who have both written and perrormed in a movie that goes close, very close, to the pains as well as the pleasures of love. We don't have any easy comic sterotypes to rely on here. Pandora Gold is a frustrated night club performer who still cannot accept that she is a poor performer. Gigi Panimba is a confused man trying to accept his fears and frustrations with women. They tell us separately and together that it takes a long time to grow up, and the process is in turn starkly ridiculous and compassionately comical. No two people could be more different from the likes of Rita Hayworth and Glenn Ford, two prototypical Hollywood images we witness Pandora imitating in her teens. But the two are immensely likable, and hardly the comic grotesques which their parents are often shown to be. Part of this film's exceptional interest is a careful comic concentration on two individuals' struggle to overcome sexual stereotyping. Pandora Gold has to give up emulating Betty Grable, Rita Hayworth, and Marlene Dietrich. Whether she will ever be able to entirely is, however, left up in the air. And Gigi Panimba remains very much his father's son in the final moments of the film.

But Pandora and Gigi are also very different from their parents. They have not found themselves closed out of the other person's life in the way their parents were with their mates. The film in no way is harshly critical of the parents: in fact the film shows that for a host of reasons these persons had loveless lives, yet remain in most ways innocent as well as thoroughly unhappy. Bergson's maxim that laughter and emotion can't mix doesn't survive the test of this film. Parental defenses and hostility remain intact; their love, vulnerability, and honor continue nevertheless to shine through.

So what makes Pandora and Gigi lives less susceptible to repeating the mistakes of the past? Well, for one thing, neither of them are clinging to the beliefs of their parents. Gigi lost the self-binding faith of his mother in late adolescence. And Pandora is obviously not superstitious in the manner of her mother. So one of the reasons their lives are so different from their parents is that they must discover values rather than blindly assert or pervert them. Furthermore, they are ahead of their parents as well in their own emotional maturity, if not stability; the fact that the elders cannot admit mistakes, cannot recognize their immobility of character, cannot change their lives offers a complete contrast to Pandora's and Gigi's hopeful willingness to work with their deficient selves and accept the necessity of self-knowledge.

But such a process is a thorny and ambiguous one, and there are no dogmatic certitudes that serve as beacons. Yet clearly Pandora and Gigi are concerned about being responsible and about self-satisfaction within the context of happy relationships. So the film lets us accept love in different ways, not only in the likes of Gigi and Pandora but in the likes of their parents as well. There is a timeless eloquence to the painfulness of love, and in several moments of this film that painful lyric note of life is captured visually in wise and unexpected ways. Made For Each Other is a product of two creative souls rendering the raw, abrasive materials of their own lives into the artistic distillation of film. When Pandora concludes her dreadful night club routine with an imitation of Dietrich singing "Falling In Love Again," we in the audience hear echoes of loneliness, heartache, and courage so far removed from the original sensuality, deceit, and decadence in The Blue Angel. Then again, the pathos and quiet terror in ordinary life and love, yoking man to a often frightening destiny, establishes an emotional continuity between these two films and registers the degree of thoughtfulness that went into the script and performances of Made For Each Other.

Five years later Taylor and Bologna made Made For Each Other, and villainy isn't so easily mocked any more or comic triumph so easily earned. This to me means that we have progressed. Instead of being stuck inside Benjamin's bored and boring head, we are put in close contact with kinds of interaction, kinds of exchanges, kinds of realities that no longer rely on latter-day fairy tale worlds for plot dynamics or for resolutions. Next to Made for Each Other, The Graduate comes off looking limited, impish, and romantic in a rather faint hearted say (decidedly anti-sexual too). Taylor and Bologna have discovered comic territory past where Mike Nichols and Elaine May achieve their harsh and telling satiric point of view (a point of view whose eventual sterility is indicated in Nichol's Carnal Knowledge). Taylor and Bologna are not satirists and in a sense are more pesimistic than Nichols and company. For the former recognize the need to accept much in order for humanity to affirm more. Gigi can yell at Pandora, "How can you be so perceptive about me and so stupid about yourself?!" and at such moments we can feel the difference between satiric analysis and comic celebration of life. The climatic New Year's Day dinner fiasco at Gigi's parents' house has about it an ethnic verocity, a felt history, a comic complexity a second viewing more than reconfirms. As society as a whole these days talks more about retrenchment and rediscovery rather than revolution, a movie like Made For Each Other makes for some happy self-examination and self-acceptance which just might be the key to accomplish both the long march and the new dawn.

A Beautiful Evoked Vendetta

BY BOB NESTI

The Go--Between

written for the screenby Harold Pinter, from the novel by H.P. Hartley; directed by Joseph Losey; featuring Julie Christie, Alan Bates, Margaret Leighton, Dominique Guard, Edward Fox, and Michael Redgrave.

Throughout The Go--Between Michelle Grand's ponderous, ornate score numbs the mind into a pronounced dislike for the style of Victorian England. It, like much of what is designed in this film, accents what we consider the ugly, lumbering quality of popular culture at the turn--of--the--century and points to what's so clearly wrong with the film. On the visual level The Go--Between is a perfect rendering of upper class British life during its apogee; the lawn teas, the obsessively mannered lifestyle, and most of all the snobbish class attitudes are effectively portrayed. Yet after so beautifully recreating a setting, director Joseph Losey and scriptwriter Harold Pinter never cease to pervade it with snide comment. Next to Death In Venice, they have created the loveliest example of thematic diarrhea in recent memory.

Here the problem is much less pronounced, but still is as equally dissatisfying as in Visconti's flawed work. Instead of a stinging indictment against the social mores of Victorian England, we get a simplistic, rabid vendetta that's neither instructive or enjoyable. The moral atmosphere is sharply black--and--white and established as to leave little interpretation of events and characters. They merely act as foils in this arty piece of social comment. Worse, there is hardly a moment respite from being reminded that the, social millieu portrayed is ludicruous, anti--democratic, and most importantly dehumanizing. In short we are told this period was ruled by self--righteous hypocrites who cared more for social proprieties than human needs. The irony is this moral climate seems right out of a turn--of--the--century dime novel and once sympathies are laid to rest, the film becomes a predictable piece of social dribble.

The script is adapted by playwright Harold Pinter from the novel by H.P. Hartley and concerns a twelve year old boy's three week visit to his wealthy school chum's country estate during the hot July of 1900. The boy Leo (Dominique Guard) is at first made uneasy by the borish, snobbish remarks of his young hosts, but finds some solace in his notoriety as a magician and his immediate rapport with his host's older sister Miriam (Julie Christie). She is a beautiful, but unhappy and meekly arrogant young lady who feels her personal life much infringed upon by her social station. She is to be married, not by choice but by design, to the young vicar of the town. Hugh Trimingham (Edward Fox), yet secretly loves the estate's tenant farmer Ted Burgess (Alan Bates).

Young Leo becomes involved in their cloistered romance when, following a minor accident at his farm, Ted asks young Leo to be the liason between the class-bound lovers. He does so, naively and dutifully, not realizing the implications of his actions and rather blindly falls in love with Miriam. When he begins to realize what is happening about him he is at first crushed, as only a twelve year old can be, to learn that Miriam and Ted are lovers. Yet he continues to be their messenger out of fear of what Miriam might think if he should refused and by Ted's uneasy promise to tell him the facts of live.

Throughout the central portion come: the annoying device of flash--forwards utilized by Losey to bridge past and present. Here we witness the older Leo, now a paunchy, sallowed face man retracing his steps decades later and reliving the story visually being portrayed. At first not only do they jar the visual framework but also only confuse the story line. When the two threads merge and the flash-- forwards make some sense (at least we realize who the people are), they only manage to ask other questions, and answer them. The older Leo and the elderly Lady Miriam, now Lady Trimingham, piece together what remains of the plot and pound home the dire effects the events had on Ted, Miriam, and specifically Leo. The boy never spiritually survived that summer. He becomes a hollowed man lost to the past.

Yet there's little empathy for Leo, or anyone for that matter. Instead we are confused, a bit dazed, and distinctly left apart from Leo's small tragedy. This coldness is only one of the film's major problems and points to how a major error in thematic judgement managed to retard an otherwise exquisite cinematic rendering. Leo's traumatized experience is based upon psychological reasoning that wallows in1 dimestore Freud and denies the complexity of existance and the possibility of human change. We don't feel for Leo because we are given no legitimite reason too. Nor do we sympathize with the lovers. Thier romance hasn't any depth, it doesn't stand independent of the anti-Victorian stance, but rather in reaction to it. Any love there may have been between Miriam and Ted is vaguely hinted at. What we see are two people flaunting the social conventions of the day for purely carnal pleasures. In the end when Lady Trimingham tells the older Leo to deliver one final message, this one to her grandson telling him the entire sordid mess, we do not believe her illicit affair was "a beautiful thing." From what we've seen the remark seems ironic; instead of a tragic confession of a tormented woman we hear what sounds like the mindless ramblings of one senile old lady who has perferred to gloss over the ugliness of her youth.

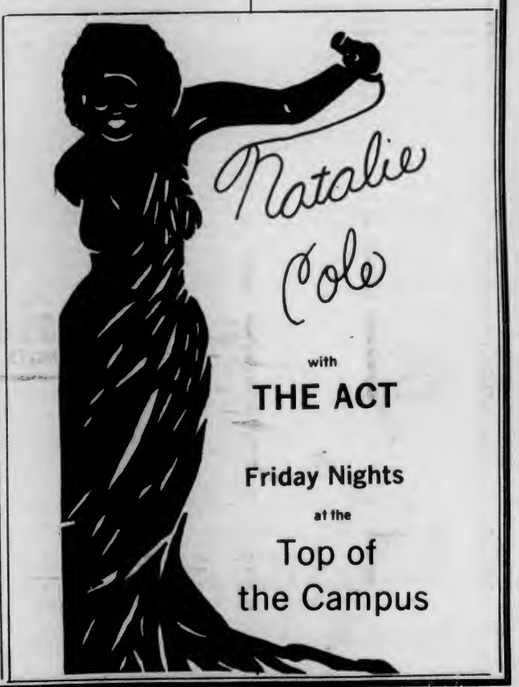
There are other points that are squashed by the inane sociological and psychological assumptions. We never understand what the black magic is all about. Immediately preceding the climax, where the lovers are discovered and the damage done there's a scene of young Leo preparing a hex. He never tells us for whom, nor does the film and it makes sense? in the end only by stretching things quite a bit. Other points are simply vague. The death of Ted is so understated that it passes by most viewers during the event--filled, confusing climax. Apparently Losey and Pinter assumed their audience would have enough knowledge of the British caste system to conclude that Ted had no other course. They, for the most part, don't, and even if they had an inkling of the reference, it so meshed in loose ends it wouldn't persuade of anything the film maker's may have intended to tell us of Victorian England.



There is no weight to the theme because it's so unconvincing, but there is a good deal of weight to the manner in which it is presented. Joseph Losey's direction takes the enterprise so seriously we feel as if we are watching a film masterpiece if only be design. Losey has always considered himself master of the British art film and his talents are, at best, erratic. The man who could make such a flawed piece of brilliant cinema as The Servant, can also be blamed for both Secret Ceremony and Boom!. His concern for art has always intruded on his ability as a filmmaker and with this film the high class artist becomes a bloody bore by trying too hard. He fills Leo's story with techniques that were all fired from trendy television commercials with hopelessly "chic" boom--shots of Leo wandering about the huge estage. Also the flash--forwards are a needless mistake in judgement. First they seem oblique, introducing a divergent point--of--view without much reason or necessity, then, in the end are only to hammer home the real implications without any restraint.

Pinter's dialogue is filled with the contemporary elitism which undeservedly demeans the characters who possess the Victorian attitudes. Quite often the family in the film look and sound absurd, not because they were, but because they are made to appear that way. They often exemplify aspects of Victorian culture so well that Pinter and Losey can't resist to make fun of them. The vicar Lord Trimingham is rather badly abused for his genuine affability is undermined by the unkind way he's presented. The only reason why we don't like him in the end is because he personifies the ideal Victorian Male so perfectly. The same can be said for Miriam's mother whose near hysterical action at the end seems villianous only because they are purely Victorian Trimingham is effete, snobbish; the mother is self-righteous, deceitful; and both are cruelly portrayed because they exemplify the morals of the age which are antithetical to the snobbish social liberalism of ours today.

The thematic sickness cannot fully undermine the visual beauty of the production. The magnificent estate is beautifully recreated with an impeccable concern for detail and a respect for the age missing from the rest of the work. The art direction and photography captures the elegance, the style, the grace of this period with remarkable delicacy. The acting, too, is nearly always first--rate making the film consistantly interesting viewing despite the appalling mistakes in judgement. Dominque Guard as the young Leo is one of the acting finds of the year and is particularly effective as the confused youth. The supporting roles are all equally finely portrayed. Margaret Leighton as the mother single--handedly convinces us the specious climax makes logical sense. Her performance is one of the finest of last year and makes the film worth seeing. The two major roles, though, aren't quite as successful as the supporting ensemble. Alan Bates plays Ted Burgess without the charm of originality which made his similar role in Women In Love of such interest. Here he waits to be the martyr and his death isn't even very well presented as it becomes the most ambiguous point of this genuinely perplexing film. The major flaw in casting comes with Julie Christie who seems far removed from the action as Miriam, her ambiviance of character doesn't accent rather hinders her characterization.

Upon first seeing The Go--Between, I overheard a young man loudly telling his date that it was the finest film he has ever seen and the cache of prizes it has garnered (including the Grand Prize at Cannes) prove somewhat its credibility as art. Still it strikes me as amazing that Losey and Pinter have pulled such a snow job on viewers and critics. The film looks like art, sounds like art, even convinces itself of its own weighty worth; but has enough glaring flaws in plot structure and thematic judgement as to best be considered trash. It is literate, pretty, finely crafted, well--portrayed, but in the end is as trashy as Michel LeGrand's pompous music score which may have you wishing never to hear an over--amplified, over--dubbed harpsichord again.

Basic Audio

Headphones: A Useful Accessory

BY FRANK JOHNSON

When headphones first became popular shortly after the advent of stereo, the reaction of many serious audiophiles was muted and they tended to regard this new augmentation as something of a toy. Taught to believe that speakers must be large to sound good, the skeptics scoffed stereo headphones as merely elaborations on the old headsets people had to wear before speakers were available in radios.

This unfavorable reception was in certain cases quite justified. Many poorly-constructed headphones were little better than the 1920- style models, and they were about as comfortable to wear. However, the evolution of quality since those early days has been rather constant throughout the audio world, and headphones have likewise profited from the improvement. The market for headphones has blossomed to the extent where a full discussion of audio gear would hardly be complete without a section on headphones. Following the articles on loudspeakers, today's column will focus broadly on uses and applications of headphones, rather than a theoretical or construction-oriented discussion which was true with the earlier column on loudspeakers. The reader who thus desires additional information in this area is free to return to the earlier column if he wishes to do so.

First off, a definition of the term "headphone" is very much in order. These devices have been accorded a variety of nomenclature, ranging from "phones" to "earpieces". For the purposes of this colum, we will establish the distinction between a headphone and an earphone in terms of size: a headphone is far too large to fit inside the ear structure and thus forms a cup around it, while an earphone may be inserted to varying degrees inside the auditory canal. Further, a headphone is different from a "headset" qualitatively; although the two terms may appear similar, headphones are designed for critical use in terms of reproducing the musical range, while a headset is concerned mainly with reproducing speech and need not have such a side range. It should also be pointed out that a headset is designed primarily for monophonic operation, while headphones employ a 3-lead connector so that they may be used for stereo (although they can of course be used monophonically). So, throughout this column we will use only the term headphones when evaluating this kind of audio component.

Headphones are actually small loudspeakers which are designed to operate efficiently with very low voltage and wattage levels. This means that, with few exceptions, headphones should never be "jumped" along the leads from the amplifier to the speaker, because the high wattage output is likely to burn out the small speakers in them. Because they need very little current to drive them, their current draw can be derived from low-voltage sections on tape recorders and tuners without the need for separate preamplification, which is why these devices are now beginning to offer headphone outputs. As they are miniature loudspeakers, the same performance criteria applies to them that applied to wide-range speakers: headphones should have wide, smooth response with a minimum of distortion, and they should be constructed so that the high frequencies do not "beam" or follow a narrow axis.

But there is one very crucial matter regarding headphones that is not important to the loudspeaker buyer: they should be comfortable to wear. No set of headphones is very useful if the owner can't place it over his head for very long, and this criterion in many cases should be put ahead of good frequency response. It is sometimes better to put up with a slightly less superb frequency range if the phones are comfortable to wear, but this incidental consideration nevertheless should not deter the buyer from the performance goal in mind. When looking at headphones it may be seen that a good measure of comfort is derived from the lack of tension on the headband and also the overall weight of the phone assembly. The tension contributes to lateral pressure, and while it may help in sealing out external noises to favor what is being played, it can also lead to fatigue and headache. Excess headphone weight tends to localize at the top of the skull over a period of time; the better headphones have some sort of padding at the center of the band to minimize the problem. Several designs have inflatable sections on which the bulk of the set's weight rests on a cushion of air. Others make do with foam rubber padding. Whatever the method employed, the one that feels the most comfortable is the one to buy.

One very important aspect of headphone design concerns sealing out external sounds to emphasize program material. The efficacy of this seal is often determined by the construction of the earcup. It should surround the ear so that it fully encloses it without imparting too much pressure. Some models have fluid-filled earcups that conform to the shape of the head, which sometimes allows them to flop around when in motion. Whatever the method, it should be constructed so that the position of the phones is fully adjustable in all directions. The headband should be separate but connected from both the phone assemblies, and if it isn't, then adjustment as to comfort might be a future problem. Also, the cord should originate from one phone only, to eliminate the potential restriction of a junction that might later form a loose connection. Each phone assembly, by the way, should be clearly marked as to left and right channels. If not, then the cord should at least stem from the left phone to permit this sort of identification. Sometimes all that is needed is a colored strip of tape to identify the proper channels.

When neophytes first put a headphone over their ears, they are apt to exclaim over the spaciousness of the sound, or even the overemphasized quality of stereo that results from a speaker lying over each ear. One distraction arises from using headphones in mono operation: the sound sometimes seems to arise from the middle of the head. The initial aversion is easy to shake loose, because the enhanced stereo effect more closely approximates "perfect" speaker placement without the problem of conflicting room acoustics or resonances. As for the monophonic "center of head" problem, it can be minimized by good design which places the speaker elements slightly further away from the ear. Learning to live with the "headphone sound" is one of the initiations incumbent upon audio engineers, for it is they who must wear the phones when auditing a master tape or disc during the mixing process. The right channel must conform to the left channel, and headphones allow the most ready and accurate form of analysis. Recording artists are also using headphones a lot too, as pictures of Steve Winwood (Traffic, 2nd album) and Carole King (Tapestry) will attest.

The Superex ST-PRO-B, one of the better headphones on the market, features a separate woofer and tweeter in each phone assembly. The photo shows how each phone pivots and therefore may easily be adjusted for the most comfort. (photo by the author)

At the moment, a new headphone design is finding its way on to the market: the electrostatic phone. (I did not discuss its cousin, the electrostatic speaker, fully in the last column, because its use is not so widespread.) Electrostatic speakers work on the principle of electrostatic attraction and repulsion. They consist of two plates, one that moves and one that does not. Different changes in the electrical potential between the plates causes the moving one - the diaphragm plate - to vibrate and give off sound. Whereas large electrostatic speakers have a hard time with low bass, because they must move a lot of air, electrostatic headphones need only move a small amount of air and thus they can have a very wide range. This range can frequently be better than that of conventional headphones.

At the present time electrostatic headphones tend to be rather costly, bulky, and dependent on a separate control box which encloses a power supply. Many electrostatic phones are not efficient and need external power supply voltage to build up the potential between the plates; this adds to bulk and cost. Sometimes the plates are fragile; voltage surges may damage them and so protective circuit breakers must be installed - the cost continues to mount. As they are developed, nevertheless, electrostatic phones offer a potentially very good quality, and they should at least be considered when shopping.

The uses for headphones are many. The most obvious one - high-volume, late night listening, has permitted many confirmed decibel enthusiasts to enjoy music without bothering neighbors or incurring landlords' evictions. If the TV and the stereo are in the same room, the stereo may be enjoyed without bothering the TV watcher. But aside from these conveniences, there are many other practical uses. Live recording makes headphones a must: professional tape recordists need a "monitor" to make sure about the quality of the recording during the process itself, and built-in speakers usually aren't of high enough quality for the job (they can also be drowned out by the music). Providing the tape recorder has a low-impedence output jack (headphones usually are rated at 8 ohms, the norm for loudspeakers), any recorder - whether it is a deck or a self-contained unit - may be used. The microphones' output also needs to be checked: do it with headphones for the most accurate results. Have you just bought an expensive amplifier and can't afford a pair of high-quality speakers? Buy a good pair of headphones in the meantime and continue to save; you can always use them until you have enough for the speakers. Do you have a stereo set in one room but want to listen to it in another room? Get a headphone extension cord and take the phones with you; up to 100' is quite possible. Need accurate tape editing? Use headphones - they're better than speakers for this job.

I am not maintaining that headphones should be used instead of speakers, however. In addition to sometimes being uncomfortable to wear, very few of them can match the tonal brilliance of a speaker, nor the proper dimension. Four-channel operation has presented some problems for headphones, although newer designs are being promoted to accomplish this end. It's also easy to kink and trip up on the cord. Further, many amplifiers don't lend themselves too well to phone operation, because their noise becomes very apparent when wearing headphones even though at normal levels it may be comfortably low. Residual hum is a particularly peristent problem with headphones used with some tube-type amplifiers having noisy low-level circuitry. Some headphones are fragile and can be easily damaged. The indisputable point, however, is that headphones are a useful accessory that complement any good hi-fi system. You will have to be the judge as to their efficacy.

When purchasing phones, always select the most comfortable ones to wear. Look for good, clean bass response and clear treble - it should not be muted or exaggereated. Use the same tests described in the last speaker article. Try as many different brands as you can to get an idea of what design appeals to you. A salesman can be helpful, but don't let him tell you what to wear. After all, you have to live with the phones.

Instructions

Incorporated in the 900 letters are names of 70 vocalists, some first names, mostly last names. This time we decided to list the 70 (below) names, as we found that last week's puzzle became relatively unsolvable without the names of the groups. As in last week's puzzle, the names read in any one of eight different directions. Either from left to right, right to left, top to bottom, bottom to top, or diagonally; from top left to bottom right, bottom right to top left, top right to bottom left, and bottom left to top right. Finish in under six hours and you're golden. Good luck and have fun!!!

Brown, Burdon, Carr, Cash, Cassidy, Christie, Clapton, Clark, Cher, Como, Conley, Charles, Crosby, Dylan, Diamond, Davis, Donovan, Edwards, Franklin, Gentry, Garfunkel, Gaye, Holly, Humperdink, Hendrix, Hardin, Harrison, Jackson, Jones, John, James, Joplin, King, Lennon, Lulu, Lindsay, McCartney, Melanie, Morrison, Mauriat, Martin, McLean, Mann, Nash, Nilsson, Orbison, Osmond, Presley, Pitney, Reed, Ross, Rydell, Redding, South, Santana, Stills, Starr, Streisand, Sinatra, Stevens, Simon, Sherman, Taylor, Thomas, Vee, Vinto, Vinton, Williams, Warwick, Young, Hopkins

Music

St. Louis Symphony

The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Walter Susskind will present a concert at 8 p.m. in Curry Hicks Cage on the UMass campus on Monday.

Susskind has selected a program designed for both students and non-students, and including Symphony No. 9 in D by Gustav Mahler and the Symphony No. 40 in G Minor by Mozart. Recognizing the international resurgence of interest in the music of Mahler, particularly among young people, the University's Fine Arts Council prevailed upon the Orchestra's management to include this major orchestral work on the program. The orchestra agreed, in spite of the necessity to fly an additional group of brass players to Amherst for this concert, since the work will not be performed elsewhere on the symphony's eastern tour.

Theater

Celebration

The Lions Share Co is the area's only resident musical theatre company making it's home at the Campus Center UMass. On March 2,3,4, 10 and 11 the Lions Share will present Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt's Celebration! which is much on the same line as their Fantastics. It will be presented in cabaret style with beverages served. Celebration theme of nature versus urban corruption is augmented by its stylized characters, dynamic mime ensemble work where the actors cause a change of mood or scene, and its exciting current percussive music and dance.

Little Mary Sunshine

The U.Mass. Theatre will present Rick Besoyan's Classic spoof, Little Mary Sunshine in Bartlett Auditorium on March 10-11, March 16-18 at 8:30 p.m. with afternoon matinees on the 11th and 18th at 2:00. Tickets are now on sale at the Bartlett Box office or may be reserved by calling 545-2579.

Little Mary Sunshine is a musical comedy for the whole family. It was first produced in New York in 1959 and has been captivating audiences all over the world ever since. Anyone who has sat thorugh such operettas as Rosemarie will find Little Mary Sunshine a hilarious parody. The plot concerns "Big Jim Warrington (our hero) who is pursuing the "evil" Indian, Yellow Feather, (our villain), and with his trusty company of Forest Rangers he comes upon the Colorado Inn, which is owned by Little Mary Sunshine (our heroine). Needless to say complications arise, but one must never fear for honesty and goodness prevail and everyone lives happily ever after.

Much Ado About Nothing

A comic play about love, Shakespeare's "Much Ado About Nothing," will be presented in a unique, new production by the Amherst Masquers at 8:30 p.m. on March 3, 4, 5 and 10, 11, 12 at Kirby Theater on the Amherst College campus.

The comedy concerns the wittiest of all Shakespeare's couples, Beatrice and Benedick. These two spend so much time in verbal duels, using clever puns, similes, and epigrams to put each other down, they never realize they are madly in love with each other. A second, more conventional romance is carried on between Claudio, Benedick's best friend, and Hero, Beatrice's cousin. The comedy is completed by the racy punning of ladies-in-waiting, the antics of a slapstick constable and his bumbling watchmen, double entendres by almost everyone, and even the meaness of a villain.

Films

The African Queen (Friday, Saturday, Merrill Screare Center, Amherst College, 7:30, 10)

The totally entertaining and endearing film version of C.S. Forester's story about a hard--bitten skipper and a spinster who become heroes and lovers during a perilous escape down an African river in 1915. The film was made on location in Africa under the skillful hand of John Huston and further abetted by a fine script by novelist and critic James Agee and two matchless performances by Humphrey Bogart and Katherine Hepburn. Bogart won an Oscar for his performance and it stands up today as his most likeable role.

Anatomy Of A Murder (Sunday, Gamble Auditorium, Mt. Holyoke College, 7)

Otto Preminger at his slick best in this tightly-made, consistently interesting adult melodrama about a murder trial which concerns an Army lieutenant who killed his wife's rapist. Beyond being a striking melodrama, the film is an insightful study of the American system of trail by jury and the workings of law. The acting is strong by a memorable cast that includes James Stewart, Lee Remick, Ben Gazzara, Arthur O'Connell, Eve Arden, Kathryn Grant, George C. Scott, and Joseph N. Welch. Preminger's reputation as a director rests with this work which shows a consistant talent missing from his recent films.

A Thousand Clowns (Monday, Student Union Ballroom, 7 and 9:15)

Herb Gardner adapted his own hit Broadway play into an endearing film which concerns a TV writer who is being investigated by Child Welfare to determine his fitness as guardian of his twelve year old nephew. Jason Robards is excellent as the television writer and Barbara Harris glows in a supporting role. The script itself is funny and touching without being contrived and corny, the performances good, and the film itself an unappreciated delight.

Cat Ballou (Friday, Hampten Dining Commons, 7, 8 and 10)

An affectionate Western parody that's managed to ridicule the West without bitterness and makes for the best film of its genre in quite some time. Jane Fonda plays Cat Ballou, a proper young lady who becomes an outlaw to avenge her father's death and forms the wildest gang of Western cliches to ever hit the screen. Lee Marvin won an Oscar in his dual role of twin brothers who both become outlaws, and his performance is remarkably funny carcicature. The rest of the cast, including Michael Callan, Dwayne Hickman, Stubby Kaye, and Nat King Cole handle the often hilarious material with the right drollness.

Claire's Knee (Thursday, SU Ballroom, 7 and 9:30)

The fifth of Eric Rohmer's five moral tales is by far his best, a film of constant charm and insight into human foibles that ranks with the best of the year. It, like this French director's other films, concerns the problem of choice and satisfaction, this time in the case of a young man's flirtations with two young girls.

The film is a wonderful blend of witty conversation and small truths which Rhomer has blended in a script blessed with impeccable taste, intelligence, and warmth. It takes place during the summer in the Alps as the lovely visuals complement the genial quality of Rohmer's story, and nearly everyone in the cast possesses a magic sense of innocence and beauty.

Dairy Of A Mad Housewife (Saturday, Sage Hall, Smith College, 7:30 and 9:30)

A story that deals with jet-set New Yorkers, and the emotionally crippled, non-communicating relationship that exists between a husband and his wife. Carrie Snodgress effectively portrays the bored and oppressed wife, who seeks refuge from her tyrannical and petty husband by sleeping with another man. The film runs at a slow pace, and while it is interspersed with comic overtones, the overall effect is one of disparing sadness. The film is directed by Frank Perry, and also stars Richard Benjamin and Frank Langella.

Dirty Harry (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)

Detective Comics in Panavision with Clint Eastwood as a San Franciscan counterpart to crime-fighting the super-hero comic strip characters. A shrewd, taut, well-made thriller that pits Eastwood as Dirty Harry against insane murderer named Scorpio. Harry is something to be seen as he single-handedly quenches a bank robbery without even sweating and Scorpio often does Harry one better in this sharp fantasy thriller. The theme of the film is simplistic dribble about how liberals are responsible for letting culprits like Scorpio out on the streets and the message may be laid on a bit too thick at the end, still those apparent flaws are all but glossed over under the firm, ingenious hand of director Don Seigel.

Fiddler on the Roof (Show case Cinemas, West Springfield)

A mundane version of the longest running musical in Broadway history. The disappointing epic comes away by director Norman Jewison who has employed needless flashy techniques in the transition. The musical becomes bottom-heavy and static when blown up on a Super Panavision screen and blasted out of twelve stereo speakers. The show itself has grace, charm, and a natural warmth that are all but eliminated here. Instead every moment reeks with phony folklines and cornball routines. The excellent Bock-Harnick score has been homogenized in musical interludes embarrassing at best, even Topol, generally considered the best of the stage Tevye's, becomes a glaring caricature of a poor, Russian peasant. An overrated, ill-conceived, charmless musical; with Norma Crane as the dutiful Goldie, and Molly Picon as Yente the Matchmaker.

The French Connection (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)

A fact-based account of how police track down a shipment of heroin in New York City which is a fast, flashy, and fascinating thriller. The grittiness and chaos of New York City is captured at breakneck speed and brutality by director William Friedkin who has fashioned perhaps the stylish and finest thriller in some time. Gene Hackman plays a boorish detective who, as the antisocial, antihuman, detective, somewhere between Bullitt and Joe, the latest film cliche.

The Hellstrom Chronicle (Wednesday, Student Union Ballroom, 7:00 and 9:30)

A motion picture documentary about war, murder, cannabalism, fornication and sexuality in a society that many of us have probably never paid too much attention too. It is a brilliant and beautifully done story of insects, who prophetically may become the new inheritors of the earth. The film focuses on the ability of insects to live in harmony, the formula that may enable them to outlast men and beasts. The close-up photography is visually breathtaking, but the rather corny narrative by Lawrence Pressman deters from the overall effect.

It Happened One Night (Sunday, Wright Hall, Smith, 8)

One of the best remembered films of the Thirties which features Clark Gable as a wandering journalist who meets up with Claudette Colbert as a runaway heiress for one of the most endearing combinations ever in a romantic comedy. The pace is fast, the humor often sharp, the performances are marvelous, and despite some age about the edges, still a wonderful comedy.

The Hospital (Showcase Cinemas, Springfield)

The world of a big city hospital is brought to life in this grim but often funny film that deals with bizarre and exaggerated situations of medical incompetence, the violent aspects of New York City life, and the bitter story of a middle-aged doctor who is suffering from the termination of a bad marriage. The film stars George C. Scott, Diana Rigg, and is directed by Arthur Hiller, with script by Paddy Chayefsky.

The Last Picture Show (Palace Cinema, West Springfield)

The Best American Film of last year is this depressing, bleak vision of life about the coming of age of three youngsters in a small Texas town in 1951. Directed by Peter Bogdanovich the film is a straightforward well crafted, well-acted narrative about the perils of growing up in the finest tradition of the great Hollywood directors. The film is nostalgia in the negative sense and despite some near melodramatic plotting is the most poignant film in quite some time. The acting is superb by a cast of mostly unknown character actors led by Cloris Leachmen, Timothy Bottoms, Jeff Bridges, Eileen Brennan, and Ben Johnson.

McCabe and Mrs. Miller (Campus Cinema)

Robert Altman has given the Western its first jolt since The Wild Bunch and, instead of gaining the honor through overdone violence and gore, he does it with delicate lyricism. The film has the effect of a ballad, as action sequences interspersed with a doleful song by Leonard Cohen. The film does have some annoying faults, the script for instance has the annoying characteristic of being purposively inarticulate a bit more than is necessary. Still Altman is probably the finest American director in recent years and his work often transcends his material. McCabe parallels the demise of a small mining town with that of a weak but likeable man. The tone is gritty and melancholy, with hardly any compensation. One of the film's major strengths is the pairing of Julie Christie and Warren Beatty in the two leads.

The Out--Of--Towners (Friday, SU Ballroom, 7, 9, and 11)

Neill Simon's not--very--funny polemic against city life that has Jack Lemmon and Sandy Dennis play two Midwesterners who visit New York and discovered the city to be a living nightmare. The situations are woefully stale and the wisecracks are, well, wisecracks Neil Simon excells in. Still weak in idea and strident in delivery with Lemmon looking harried and Dennis being herself which, I might say, is about as snively as an actress dares to appear on the screen without being embarrassed.

Snow Job (Calvin Theatre, Northampton and Amherst Cinema)

A boring and useless film that proves nothing more than the fact that Jean Claude Killy is still the greatest skier alive. The semblance of a plot involves romance with a cops and robbers escapade that takes place on the slopes, employing some fine skiing shots that make a valiant attempt to compensate for the bad acting and the film's weaknesses.

X, Y and Zee (Showcase Cinemas)

The most inanely titled film quite some time is this bitchy, romantic melodrama that reads like Modern Romance written by Edward Albee. The story concerns unhappy middle-aged marriage in contemporary London and the way three way affair employed to save it. It stars Susannah York as a young botique owner who has an affair with Michael Caine but has tendencies for his wife, Elizabeth Taylor, whose medusa--like presence makes for her most grotesque appearance since Boom! to be reviewed.

Yellow Submarine (Saturday, Mahar, 6, 8, 10, 12)

A fanciful and animated visual odyssey that features cartoon caricatures of the Beatles and is supplied with plenty of their songs. The film concerns Pepperland, home of the Lonely Hearts Club Band, and the submarine escape that occurs when Pepperland is attacked by the Blue Meanies. The film is an ingenuous visual trip that provides plenty of action and contains a good amount of clever comedy. Directed by George Running.

Muskie-McGovern Debate Their Honesty

DURHAM (AP) — Democratic rivals in the New Hampshire presidential primary met in televised debated Sunday night, with Sens. Edmund S. Muskie, and George McGovern disputing who was first in disclosing sources of campaign money.

The 90-minute, five-candidate session broke no new ground in the campaign for the nation's leadoff presidential primary Tuesday.

Instead, it provided a televised forum for a restatement of the positions and arguments the candidates have sounded across the state.

Muskie said after the debate he did not know how it would affect Tuesday's voting, while McGovern said, "I'm not sure it will have much of an impact.

"It is difficult to get a clear test when you have five candidates dividing up the time," said the South Dakota Democrat, Muskie's closest challenger.

Aides to both Muskie and McGovern said they were pleased with the way things had gone.

The debate was broadcast by WENH, the educational channel in New Hampshire. It was to be shown later by public broadcasting stations in major cities around the country.

The format was a four-minute opening statement for each entry, a series of questions put by a panel of four newsmen and finally a three-minute windup statement.

Muskie used his windup time to challenge McGovern's repeated campaign charge that the favored senator from Maine has refused to disclose anything about his campaign donations.

McGovern made public a week ago the names and donations of more than 42,000 people he said have provided $1.26 million for his campaign.

As the candidates' debate ended, he again challenged his rivals to list campaign contributions. He said that every person who seeks the presidency should publicly declare "the source of every dollar contributed to his campaign..."

Muskie has refused to make a disclosure of current contributions matching McGovern's, and the South Dakota senator has made campaign ammunition of the issue.

"I have disclosed the sources of contributions to my campaign for the presidency," Muskie countered. "I was the first candidate to do so, and no other candidate followed my lead until almost two years after my first reports were filed...I did so in 1970."

But Muskie said he stopped filing public reports after that because nobody else did so. "I decided we needed a policy that applied to all candidates, including the President," he said.

Muskie noted that this will become the law effective April 7.

"Now, if I may turn to the real issues in this campaign," he said, dismissing the disclosure dispute as something less than that.

The debate formats gave equal time to Muskie, McGovern, Los Angeles Mayor Sam Yorty, Sen. Vance Hartke of Indiana and Edward T. Coll of Hartford, Conn., who is 32 and ineligible to be president anyhow.

Eight questions were put to the candidates during the program; each of them got one minute to respond.

"The biggest fight seems to be over where Sen. Muskie's money comes from, and why he won't publish it," said Yorty, adding, "...Of course, this is no debate."

McGovern didn't mention it in the debate, but he has repeatedly quoted to New Hampshire audiences a statement attributed to Muskie that he would be out of the campaign if he disclosed all his contributors.

One other point that stirred a heated controversy was the question of when the Democratic contenders became the critics of war in South Vietnam. McGovern, Muskie and Hartke all advocated total U.S. withdrawal from the war zone.

"I took a position against this war in 1963 when the polls showed that it was very unpopular to oppose our involvement in Southeast Asia," said McGovern.

Muskie said the voters can select a candidate who denies mistakes, or admits them and tries to correct them.

"The three senators who are here all voted for the Gulf of Tonkin resolution," Muskie said. That measure, adopted in August, 1964, was cited by former President Lyndon B. Johnson as congressional authorization for expansion of the war.

"Furthermore," Muskie said, "they all voted against repealing the resolution in 1966." He said all three senators "have a different view of the war now." He said it is a mark of responsiveness to the wishes of the people that their views have changed.

When McGovern got the opportunity, he disputed that.

"There is a difference between senators," he said. McGovern said the Tonkin resolution was misinterpreted and misused by the Johnson administration.

But he said that as late as the 1968 Democratic National Convention Muskie was "defending the Johnson war plank while I was trying to end the war."

The five-man debate included only the Democrats on the Tuesday ballot; another entry, Rep. Wilbur D. Mills of Arkansas, is seeking write-in votes in an expensive radio and television advertising campaign.

Mills campaigned at a reception in Manchester while the other Democrats were preparing for their debate at the University of New Hampshire.

"I am now officially a candidate for U.S. president," said the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. But he said nobody asked him to take part in the debate.

Mills said he intends to campaign actively in the Massachusetts and Rhode Island primaries, and intends to enter others.

"I think I've got just about as much chance of winning as anybody in the field," he said.

Orgies And The Girl With Toothpaste

(Yesterday's Boston Globe carried an article by Madeleine Blais which proported to be an acount of co-ed living at Amherst. (See story below)

That objectivity was obtained is somewhat questionable. Becuase the Globe is one of the papers which many parents use as the Truth, an interview with the author was thought to be in order. Not only to discover the reasons for its being but to uncover the workings of the individual behind it.)

By DON SAINT-PIERRE

Ms. Blais was phoned at her Cambridge apartment and asked the reasons behind the assigning of the story.

She explained that the Globe (her editor) "thought that co-ed living was the most important single aspect in university life that has developed during the last few years." And that her editor wanted her to contrast her college experience with that here.

She graduated in 1959 from the College of New Rochelle, a Catholic woman's college in New York. As she said, "It was a contrast of extremes."

The Collegian had received some reports stating that she did not identify herself as a reporter when on campus which she denied. But she said that she did, at first, say she was writing a socialogical report, saying it was her editor's idea, and that those people with whom it was used weren't too impressed so she just said she was a reporter.

Because the story leaves many questions unanswered in ambiguity, she was asked what her personal feelings were on what she saw. She said that the co-ed approach to educational housing is "the trend of the future and that most schools which don't presently have it will eventually." She mentioned that in Sweden, where co-ed dorms have been a reality for many years, the trend is now towards a floor-to-floor separation rather than the room-to-room. She feels that "this is to satisfy that aspect of our culture which demands the hen-talks and man-to-man conversations."

She doesn't feel there is any possibility of the story producing a write-in campaign by parents to the State House demanding change of the situation. She emphasized this by mentioning a conversation she had over the weekend with some "middle-aged people", who when asked for comments on co-ed living said "There's nothing we can do about it."

She felt that the "psychological problems" encountered by students at Southwest are probably a result of that area being so much like a large urban city. That students chose Amherst because it was an opportunity to escape to the country and when faced with the tower concept of housing became distressed.

When asked about the rather quick ending to the article, she said that space had forced the editor to cut the last two paragraphs which, she feels, prove a more complete ending.

She dictated the following as her ending to the story:

"Is this (co-ed living) the first step in a brave new uni-sexual world, where all the important sexual differences are being down-played to the point of extinction? i.e. the re-writing of biology perhaps?

"Or does co-ed living merely harden...the phasing out of the wolf whistle as part of the vocabulary between men and women?

"Have Betty co-ed and Joe college finally come into their own shunning the old sexual norms and forging new identities?"

Many interesting and important questions. One wonders what the Globe's answer might be.

Field House, one of the dorms visited by the Globe correspondent who wrote the story below.

The Globe Looks At UMass Co-ed Living

(Editors note: Once again sex at UMass is in the Boston newspapers. The following story is re-printed from yesterday's Boston Sunday Globe. Also on this page is an interview with the reporter who authored the work.)

By MADELEINE BLAIS

Intent on discovering whether sexual freedom and academic pursuits can coexist felicitously, I trundled off to the University of Massachusetts in Amherst.

Disguised as a student (a pair of dungarees and a scorn for cosmetics served the purpose nicely), I dorm-hopped for three nights at coed residence halls.

Some things about dorm life haven't changed. The bathrooms remain damply reminiscent of the last shower taken there.

The vending machines in the recreation rooms hawk the same candy and soda, and the tables are still awash with crumbs you can't even call your own.

Privacy is, as ever, at a premium.

My first night was spent in a dorm called Eugene Field.

"They used to call this dorm "Frigid Field," " said one girl, "but not anymore."

Like most coed dorms at UMass, Field is structured to cater to varied tastes in coed living. One floor is occuped entirely by women, another is room-to-room coed, and several are divided so that one corridor belongs to men and another to women.

My hostess at Field lived in a room that was far less politely pastel than the rooms at the women's college I entered in 1965.

Even a short seven years ago, women's colleges were believed to mysteriously provide a sure route to good breeding. At that time, I believed that it was advantageous for women to pursue knowledge as a sex, without being undermined by the distracting presence of men.

I arrived at college in possession of one pair of soft-soled slippers.

The college handbook had gravely advised that such apparel was absolutely essential to tranquility in the dorms. Demur decors in the rooms made sense in that setting.

But at UMass, the rooms do more than store wardrobes. They are the focus for socializing.

"Just walk into any room with an ajar door," my hostess urged. "That means company is welcome."

The chief distinction between my school in 1965 and UMass today is that behind those ajar doors, students of both sexes mingle freely.

"Orgies? Here?" said one student, eager to discredit rumored debauchery. "How could I have an orgy with a girl I depend on for toothpaste?"

He was sprawling on the bottom bunk in a classmate's room. The classmate, a girl dressed in the weathered jeans and jersey that practically qualifies as a uniform for UMass females, fetched beer from a small refrigerator in the room. An electric frying pan and a hot plate rested on top of the fridge; the room was outfitted like a fall-out shelter.

"Where's your roommate?" I asked the girl.

"Oh, she spends every night with her boyfriend. He lives on the adjacent corridor."

"That can be a rough deal," her male guest explained. "Everybody on the corridor keeps a fishbowl watch on everybody else, and it can be really traumatic if you break up."

"We have one couple on our corridor," the said. "But they're just like an old married couple. Always yelling at each other."

"What about the university," I said, "what about its 'in loco parentis' mandate to maintain propriety?"

"The University doesn't care. They don't officially encourage coed roommates, so coed roommates don't officially exist on this campus," the girl answered.

"Besides," said her male friend, "there's great pressure on the students to avoid sexual contact. The kids here consciously try to assume a sibling format to their relationships."

"Like us," the girl responded, a trace wistfully.

At my school, men were a weekend phenomenon and we bravely bridged the haitus between Sunday evening and the following Friday by studying and by speculating over the surprises a single phone call might bring.

On the whole, the students accepted coed living as a natural function of campus life. It strikes them as infinitely less sensational than the leering public might assume.

"The main result of coed living," one boy commented, "is that now the girls see us all the time and they know we're useless," dismissing the topic as worthy of only humorous consideration.

From a reporter's point of view, his remark was a cut above the scores of students who thought questions about coed living weren't worth answering.

"Let's talk about something controversial," they would suggest. "Let's talk about the food here."

Even the heads of residence were surprised that so routine a matter would deserve scrutiny. "If the kids are going to get together sexually, they will. There's no correlation between coed living and promiscuity," said Luther Allen, head of Webster dormitory.

I moved over to the least leafy section of campus, called "Southwest" or, unofficially "Concrete City," for the remainder of my visit. I stayed in Washington, a huge 22-story high rise.

This is the part of campus where alienation flourishes. The students brand the high rise "an insult to the environment" and "a miracle of architectural insensitivity."

"It's like having a freeway running through your living room," one student complained.

In the high rises, thefts are greater, stereos compete more aggressively for sonic supremacy, the graffiti is bawdier, and the omnipresecence of marijuana threatens the obsolescence of beer.

Despite whatever unpleasantness prevails in this section, the students have concluded that coed living has upgraded conditions there.

"If it weren't for the girls, this dorm would be unbearable," one male stated.

After parking my backpack in an empty, eighth floor room, I strolled toward the bathroom.

The bathroom, I discovered, is "liberated," or coed.

While I washed my hands, my peripheral vision took mental notes on the young man swaggering toward the showers, towels wrapped around their waists.

I asked a girl what she thinks of sharing the bathroom with men.

"Oh, you get used to it," she said. "My father thinks I'll lose my femininity, but it makes no difference to me whether the shoes in the next stall belong to a man or a woman."

"Whenever my parents visit, either my mother or I have to scout the bathroom to make sure there are no women here before my dad will use it," she continued.

For her, the only disadvantage of coed bathrooms is the unwritten rule that some minimal modesty be maintained.

"It's a pain to mouse out of my

The office of the DAILY COLLEGIAN is on the second floor of the Student Union on the campus of the University of Massachusetts, zip code 01002. Telephones: 545-2550 (news); 545-0344 (sports); 545-0731 (business).

Second-class postage is paid in Amherst. THE DAILY COLLEGIAN publishes Monday through Friday during the academic year, except during vacation, exam periods or holidays. Accepted for mailing under the authority of an act of March 8, 1879; as amended by an act of June 11, 1943. Subscription rates are $6.00 per semester or $10.00 per year.

Governor Francis Sargent will speak here tomorrow night on the environment. Reports state that he will not allow any question-answer periods or a press conference. Many students have expressed a desire for him to address himself to problems that have arisen since he was invited to speak here, such as Belchertown and UMass budget cuts. (MDC Photo by Joe Casey)

University Store Ripoff Penalty Is Suspension

By STEVE TRIPOLI

It's going to cost a lot more than it used to if you're caught ripping anything off from the University Store in the future.

That's the word from Student Attorney General Henry Bouffard. In an interview last Thursday Bouffard told the Collegian that due to the amount of losses incurred in the University Store ($80,000 last year, more this year) the penalty for stealing had to be increased.

"To date the penalty has been a couple of semesters probation and sometimes a letter of censure. This hasn't deterred anyone."

The new penalty is much more severe. Bouffard outlined the system:

"First offense - no matter how small - we expect a one semester suspension. If suspended you lose all money paid for that semester, and if the suspension occurs near the end of a semester it applies for the whole next semester."

Bouffard also made clear that if a student ever is in dire need of something and can't afford it, he can always come to him in Room 921 Campus Center.

"I'll arrange for it or refer the matter to the proper authority. I know suspension is harsh, but the way it is now, the whole student body pays for ripoffs (and there's been twenty-five a week on the average) in the form of an increase in their Campus Center fee."

Rally Supports Five

The pre-trial hearing of five area individuals arrested on drug charges last October 31st is scheduled for tomorrow morning at approximately 10 at the Hampshire County Superior Court in Northampton. A rally on behalf of the defendants: Ronald Kosnicki, John Miller, Harry Gold, Charles Volkman, and Lorrie Lyon has been planned by the Amherst Bill of Rights Committee.

The Committee was formed out of alleged police malpractice (primarily on the part of Officer Edward Montleon) in the arrest and subsequent detainment of the defendants. The Committee contends that the illegal procedure used by Montleon "constituted an act of illegal search and seizure". If it can be proven that the narcotics to be used as evidence against Kosnicki and the others was obtained illegally, all charges against the five would have to be dropped.

Stemming from this allegation of illegal police procedure, a separate, civil action has been filed in the name of Miller, seeking $100,000 in damages from Officer Montleon for false arrest and imprisonment.

Those individuals wishing to attend the hearing itself are reminded of the Courtroom requirement of proper dress.

Student Shot In Dormitory

Jonathan Golub, a UMass senior, was shot in his dormitory room in Cance House 8 a.m. Friday morning.

Golub said he opened his door in response to a knock and was shot and wounded above the right eye by a small caliber bullet. The wound was not serious. Golub was treated at the Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton, and released to the UMass Infirmary.

At this time, no motive has been discovered for the shooting, although the incident is under investigation.

Reportedly, the Amherst police have put out an alert for a black male, 5 feet 8 inches. This has not been confirmed.

Golub, from Canton, is a psychology.

SOS Open Meeting Tonight

The third open organizational meeting of Students Offering Support (SOS) will take place tonight at 7:30 in the Dining Rooms (Dukes and Berkshire rooms) of the Student Union.

SOS provides a means of expressing support and obtaining funds for the Belchertown State School class-action suit. The suit is now in U.S. District Court.

The suit, filed by 28 parents, charges that the state Department of Mental Health has been negligent in the care of patients at the school.

It is expected that the legal cost in taking this case to court will be outstanding and that the case would possibly be drawn out by the state in order to drain the funds of the parents directly involved in the suit.

The State of Massachusetts argued last Thursday in court that persons who are voluntarily admitted to a state school for the retarded have no constitutional right to demand treatment.

Thursday's motion by the state also asked Judge Francis Ford to dismiss the case for lack of jurisdiction, or to abstain from exercising jurisdiction in it. Judge Ford took the motion under advisement.

Chairman Joe Sylvia--a UMass graduate student--announced the formation of another SOS organization, this one at Bentley College in Waltham.

G.M. Predicts Quick End To Lordstown Strike

LORDSTOWN, Ohio (AP) — A spokesman for General Motors Corp. predicted an early settlement as negotiations continued Sunday in an effort to solve remaining grievances involved in a strike at the huge GM Lordstown complex.

"Significant progress' was made during talks that started Saturday, he said.

A spokesman for United Auto Workers Local 1112, which went on strike at 2 a.m. Saturday, agreed that there was progress during the bargaining but said some major issues remained unresolved.

Negotiators for GM and the union were divided into teams working with various grievances.

The strike by 7,700 workers at the Vega automobile and Chevrolet truck assembly plants brought to a head a five-month dispute over the speed of assembly lines.

The walkout so far has not affected production since the lines at the two facilities have not operated on weekends for the past month.

Some 500 grievances have been filed by the union since Oct. 1, when assembly operations were consolidated under GM's Assembly Division. About 800 employes have been laid off since, but the union claims the company has insisted on maintaining the same production pace as under the former setup.

GM has accused the workers of sabotage and shoddy workmanship which it said led to a backlog of repairs before vehicles could be shipped out, resulting in workers being sent home early from their jobs on numerous occasions.

The union has denied the accusations. It says that with the layoffs and no slowup of the assembly lines, the workers remaining do not have to do their work properly.

Nixon Reaches White House

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon returned to the White House Sunday night and scheduled a Monday meeting on school busing and financing of education.

The President called together his Cabinet committee on busing, made up of Acting Atty. Gen. Richard A. Kleindienst, HEW Secretary Elliot L. Richardson and George Shultz, director of the Office of Management and Budget.

Also expected to join in the meeting, which was described as one to hear an exchange of views and options on busing, are Nixon's chief domestic adviser, John Ehrlichman, and three blacks in the Nixon administration.

Neal Ball, deputy news secretary, listed the three as Samuel Jackson, assistant secretary of Housing and urban Development; Robert Brown, special assistant to the President, and Norman Houston, deputy assistant secretary of Health, Education and Welfare.

Ball said no final decision or presidential position on busing is expected to come from the Monday session. He called it part of a process by which Nixon is arriving at a decision.

Nixon announced last month he was asking the committee to make recommendations on how the administration should proceed on the busing issue.

Flood Death Toll Rises, Guardsmen Find Coal Camps

MAN, W. Va. (AP) — The death toll in flood-devastated Buffalo Creek Hollow rose to 103 Sunday as National Guardsmen unearthed eight more bodies from the wreckage of coal camps all but destroyed more than a week ago.

About 70 persons were still missing and there was little hope many of those survived the flood of some 175 million gallons of water loosed when a Buffalo Mining Co. dam gave way at the head of the 17-mile valley.

A government geologist, William Davies, said Sunday he did not think regular checking of the coal mine waste structure would have prevented the disaster. He said such dams "should be engineered completely differently."

Davies, interviewed on WSAZ-TV in Charleston, said a weak foundation may have lowered the top of the dam and allowed the water to crest it. He stated that geologists had seen no evidence of an explosion and said reports of a blast before the flood possibly were prompted by steam generated from the spontaneous combustion in the slag heap.

In 1966, Davies headed a survey of 38 coal waste banks in southern West Virginia. Four of the banks "showed signs of instability," according to the survey, but Davies said the one in Buffalo Creek was not among them.

Still missing are entire families, including a woman and her five children.

"We can still hope some of them are alive," a military official said. "But hope is all it is, and it can't be much hope at this point."

To aid in probing the tons of wreckage guardsmen have begun using a 50-ton crane to hoist the debris and drop it back to the ground. If no bodies fall out, the debris is burned.

At the high school in Man, and at another refugee center at Wharton, more than 300 persons whose homes were destroyed continued to sleep on cots. They were among the estimated 4,000 left homeless by the flood.

Amnesty

WASHINGTON (AP)-Robert C. Ransom and Martin Kelly lost sons in the Vietnam war. Ransom strongly supports amnesty now for draft resisters and Kelly vehemently opposes the idea.

Their conflicting testimony last week before a Judiciary subcommittee headed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., reflects the deep division on the issue.

Pioneer 10 Past Million-Miles

PASADENA (AP) — Pioneer 10, streaking toward Jupiter at 20,500 miles per hour, completed two critical maneuvers after passing the one-million-mile mark, space officials said Sunday.

The spacecraft successfully test-fired thrusters which will be used for Tuesday's planned midcourse change, and spacecraft controllers activated a craft-rotation system that keeps Pioneer linked to earth with a thin radio beam, officials said.

Scientists also turned on the sixth of 11 instruments in Pioneer 10 in the Saturday night maneuvers, a spokesman for the California Institute of Technology's Jet Propulsion Laboratory said. The instrument is a cosmic ray telescope that began sending back data on the galaxy's high-enery particles Sunday.

Pioneer 10 was launched on its 21-month odyssey to Jupiter from Cape Kennedy, Fla., last Thursday and was speeding toward the 1.5 million mark of the 620-million-mile trip Sunday night.

Tuesday's maneuver will determine the spot where Pioneer 10 will fly by Jupiter. One of the possible target points is Io, Jupiter's orange moon, which some scientists believe has an atmosphere.

Viet-Cong Blast Destroys Ammunition

SAIGON (AP)-U.S. warplanes attacked antiaircraft defenses inside North Vietnam for the fifth successive day Sunday, military sources said.

All U.S. planes were reported to have returned safely.

The raids were described as "protective reaction," following a U.S. policy under which planes are authorized to attack North Vietnamese targets considered a threat to reconnaissance aircraft flying over the north or bombers operating over neighboring Laos.

Eleven protective reaction strikes were reported by the U.S. command in the four day through Saturday.

The North Vietnamese Foreign Ministry issued a second statement in two days claiming that the United States "continued to send aircraft to attack many populated areas...committing many more crimes against the Vietnamese people."

In ground fighting, North Vietnamese and Viet Cong troops attacked a South Vietnamese infantry position near the provincial capital of Vi Thanh in the Mekong Delta, about 110 miles southwest of Saigon. Six government soldiers were reported killed and 11 wounded in the predawn assault Sunday.

The Saigon command said the enemy assault force was repulsed. Eight enemy troops were reported killed in that action and another eight in the same area later Sunday.

In the northern sector of South Vietnam, enemy troops fired 28 rockets into base camps Fuller and Carroll, which are part of a line of defense along the demilitarized zone. The Saigon command said there were no government casualties.

Fifteen enemy soldiers were reported killed in a clash about 20 miles south of Da Nang. One South Vietnamese soldier was wounded, the Saigon command said.

A powerful explosion ripped through a South Vietnamese river convoy near Saigon Sunday morning, sinking three barges loaded with 300 tons of ammunition, including bombs and artillery shells. Two other escort vessels were damaged.

Three men were reported missing and six injured.

The convoy was moving up the Doug Nai River, apparently headed for the Bien Hoa air base, 15 miles northeast of the capital.

Reverberations from the blast shattered windows and glass doors in Saigon, where many feared a Viet Cong terrorist attack was underway. Military police scurried about but found nothing.

The South Vietnamese military command said it believed an underwater mine set off the blast.

But U.S. Navy advisers at the nearby Cat Lai base said they suspected a bazooka-type rocket was responsible.

"We found a piece of what looked like the part of a tail assembly of a B41 rocket," one adviser said.

The South Vietnamese said the convoy included three ammunition barges, a tug, two medium craft-presumably minesweepers-and two river patrol boats. It reported the three barges and one medium craft sunk and the tug heavily damaged.

However, the U.S. Navy advisers reported a minesweeper was flooded and had minor damage in addition to the sinking of the barges. They said the tug sustained major damage.

Action elsewhere in South Vietnam on Sunday was reported light and scattered.

In the air war, the strikes over North Vietnam on Saturday marked the fourth successive day of raids over the North and raised to 78 the number of "protective reaction" missions reported by the U.S. Command this year.

The targets of the attacks were at points 60 to 90, and 110 miles north of the demilitarized zone. The results were not known, the command said. It denied a Hanoi claim that a U.S. F4 jet was shot down.

For the first time in several weeks, there were no U.S. B 52 raids reported in South Vietnam during the 24-hour period ending at noon Sunday.

But the U.S. Command reported B52 strikes against enemy supply lines in both Laos and Cambodia Saturday.

Soviets Pledge Bangladesh Aid

MOSCOW (AP)-The Soviet Union has pledged financial and technical assistance to Bangladesh in an agreement signed in Moscow, Tass reported Sunday.

The agreement was concluded by visiting Bangladesh Prime Minister Mujibar Rahman and Soviet Premier Alexei N. Kosygin and its details were sketched out in a "joint declaration" reported by the official news agency. The dollar worth of the Soviet commitment was not revealed through some diplomats described it as "substantial."

First of all, Kosygin promised Mujib that Soviet projects planned or under way at the time Bangladesh was still East Pakistan will be carried on. These include an electrical equipment plant, a thermal power plant, radio stations and an offshore oil prospecting project. Funds totaling $45.6 million were unblocked for these projects.

In addition, the joint declaration said the Russians will help in the "reconstruction and development" of Bangladesh's merchant and fishing fleet and of the nation's railway lines, badly damaged during the civil war preceding Bangladesh independence.

Besides direct financial or material aid, the Russians committed themselves to "training national cadres for various branches of industry and agriculture" and for providing "consultative services" to rehabilitate Bangladesh industry.

On political matters, Soviet leaders said they would back Bangladesh's request for U.N. membership.

Mujib arrived in Moscow last Wednesday on his first official visit outside the Indian subcontinent. Soviet treatment of him from his lodging in the Kremlin to his meetings with all the top leaders and his reaction to it all indicated the Russians have succeeded in strengthening their political bridgehead in southern Asia.

Kleindienst Inquiry Moved Up To Today

WASHINGTON (AP)-In an unexplained, surprise move, the Senate Judiciary Committee announced Sunday that its inquiry into accusations against Acting Atty. Gen. Richard G. Kleindienst will be resumed Monday morning, instead of Tuesday.

The committee counsel, John H. Holloman III, announced the change but declined to say who will testify as the panel delves further into allegations made by columnist Jack Anderson against Kleindienst.

Kleindienst's nomination to be attorney general had been approved unanimously by the committee and reported to the Senate last week before Anderson wrote that an antitrust action against the International Telephone and Telegraph Corp. was settled in a fashion favorable to the big conglomerate after ITT had pledged $500,000 to help finance the Republican National Convention in San Diego next August.

Kleindienst requested the hearing and in testimony last week denied that there was any link between the settlement and the pledged contribution, or that he even knew of the latter until after the out-of-court agreement was reached.

It seemed likely that one key witness, Dita Beard, would not appear either day although she has been subpoenaed.

Mrs. Beard is a Washington lobbyist for ITT and a keystone piece in Anderson's accusations against Kleindienst and Mitchell is a memo she prepared for her Washington boss.

She left Washington last week as Anderson's allegations were published and the committee was unable to serve a subpoena on her. She was located in a Denver hospital Saturday and a subpoena was served on her late Saturday night.

Grand Juries to Take Action In Irving Case

NEW YORK (AP)-Sources close to the investigation of Clifford Irving's purported autobiography of Howard Hughes say federal and county grand juries have "90 per cent of the evidence now" and will take joint action in the case this week.

Irving met with federal and county prosecutors for 6 1/2 hours Friday, but the sources said over the weekend that the government already had presented virtually its entire case to the two panels.

Candidates Gather For N.H. Primary

Sen. Edmund S. Muskie in New Hampshire campaigning for the presidential primary to be held Tuesday. (AP Wirephoto)

DURHAM, N.H. (AP)-Democratic rivals in the New Hampshire presidential primary squared off Sunday after a televised debate as they bid for votes in Tuesday's lead-off election in 1972.

Five entries were to appear jointly for 90 minutes in a question and answer debate broadcast by WENH, the educational channel in New Hampshire.

Public broadcasting stations in major cities around the country were to show the debate later, providing a national forum for the confrontation featuring Sens. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine, the favorite, and George McGovern of South Dakota, his closest challenger.

The other New Hampshire candidates are Sen. Vance Hartke of Indiana, Mayor Sam Yorty of Los Angeles and Edward T. Coll, a social worker from Hartford, Conn.

In addition, Rep. Wilbur D. Mills of Arkansas is seeking write-in votes with an expensive radio and television campaign.

Muskie, whose New Hampshire rating dropped in a poll published by The Boston Globe, said that "there is no one primary I can see that has an apocalyptic effect" on the campaign for the Democratic nomination.

Muskie has said that his campaign probably could not survive an outright defeat in New Hampshire. No one expects that.

The Globe poll, conducted by Becker Research Corp., rated Muskie at 42 per cent, down from 65 per cent reported in a similar poll completed on Jan. 24.

McGovern received 26 per cent in the last sampling, the other entries trailed far behind, with 20 per cent of the voters reported undecided.

President Nixon's challengers in the Republican primary, Reps. Paul N. McCloskey of California and John Ashbrook of Ohio, made a joint appearance on television, too.

Both said that given present administration policies they probably would not support Nixon in November.

"There's no way I could support his policies," said Ashbrook. The Ohio conservative said he might vote for the President but would not campaign for him.

"I can't even begin to support the President if he continues this bombing in Laos and Cambodia," McCloskey said.

They appeared on separate segments of the CBS-TV-radio program "Face the Nation."

Report Urges UN Join Ecology Fight

UNITED NATIONS (AP)-A report prepared here proposes a new U.N. body to coordinate a world fight against pollution, partly along lines suggested by President Nixon. The 39-page report issued Sunday was directed to the U.N. Conference on the Human Environment to take place in Stockholm, Sweden, June 5-16.

Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim had it circulated on the eve of the fourth session of the 27-nation preparatory committee for the conference, the last before the event itself. The report, drafted by the conference secretariat, also suggested an Environment Fund made up of voluntary contributions from governments to help finance international environmental activities.

That paralleled the proposal Nixon made Feb. 8 in his annual environmental message to Congress, calling for a $100 million voluntary U.N. Fund for the Environment.

The U.N. report said a "central environmental body" is needed to spot trends, guide research, coordinate the monitoring of pollutants, promote international agreements to fight the, collect and disseminate information on the environment and foster education on the subject.

"There seems to be general agreement," it said, "on the need for an intergovernmental body to perform these functions."

This body, it went on, might be a subsidiary of either the General Assembly or the Economic and Social Council or might report through the council to the assembly.

It said the unit would need a secretariat and should make use of scientific advisers.

Governments, it said, "may wish to consider" financing the administrative costs of the new body out of the regular U.N. budget, and setting up a voluntary fund to pay for international environmental aid programs.

The preparatory committee is expected to be two members short when it convenes Monday to finish its work. The Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia have notified the conference secretary-general, Maurice Strong, that they will boycott the committee session.

Both are upset because the General Assembly left East Germany off the invitation list for the conference by limiting it to countries in the United Nations or specialized agencies.

Because of that, there are fears that the whole Soviet bloc will stay away from the conference.

Ireland Launches Man-Hunt

BELFAST (AP)-Security forces launched a massive search of Northern Ireland Sunday for the terrorists who bombed a crowded Belfast restaurant. The Roman Catholic primate of all Ireland condemned the bombing, which killed two persons and maimed others.

A security spokesman in Belfast delcared: "Make no mistake about it. We are determined to catch the perpetrators of this dastardly crime."

A spokesman in Dublin for the nationalist "Provisional" wing of the outlawed Irish Republican Army-IRA-denied responsibility for the blast. Police said the IRA did it, but the IRA spokesman blamed Protestant extremists.

There was no word from the leftist "official" wing of the IRA. The IRA guerrillas seek to end British control of Northern Ireland and unite it with the predominantly Catholic Irish republic to the south.

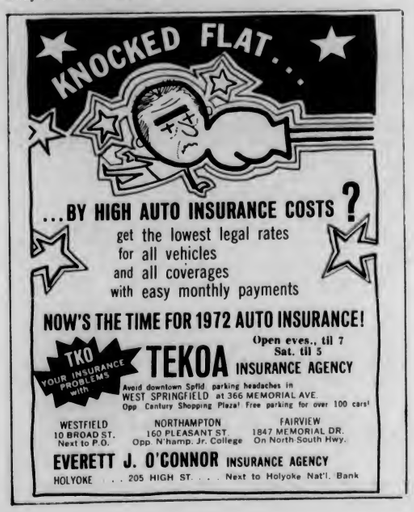
Saturday's blast at the Abercorn Restaurant, packed with 200 persons, mostly women and children taking a tea break from shopping, killed two women and wounded 136 other persons-27 of them gravely. Some of the 27 are dying, Royal Victoria Hospital said.

Five persons lost limbs, including one 20-year-old who lost both legs and an arm. Three others each lost an eye.

The Roman Catholic primate, William Cardinal Conway, took to the pulpit of St. Patrick's Cathedral in Armagh to assail the bombers.

"Everyone with a spark of human feeling will have been horrified by the news of yesterday's explosions in which so many innocent people were killed or unjustly maimed," he said.

A bomb blast wrecked the mess hall of a British army brigade in Aldershot, England, Feb. 22, killing five waitresses, a gardener and a Catholic chaplain. The official wing of the IRA said after the blast that it was in retaliation for the killing of 13 civilians on "Bloody Sunday" in Londonderry in January. Both wings of the IRA have vowed to kill 13 British soldiers as revenge.



There was no indication the restaurant bombing was a "Bloody Sunday" revenge act.

A spokesman at the Royal Victoria Hospital said eight operating theaters were in constant use Saturday for six hours treating victims. A number had compound fractures. Some were badly burned.

One of the surgeons said it was "the most dreadful night since the troubles started" 31 months ago.

The deaths of Anne Frances Owens, 22, and her 21-year-old friend Janet Bereen, brought Northern Ireland's toll of lives in that period to 263.

The surgeon, who for professional reasons declined to give his name, said some of those he had treated would be maimed for life. One man and two women lost both legs.

"Free Angela" Movement Swells

SAN JOSE (AP) — Supporters of Angela Davis throughout the world have rallied to the cry "Free Angela" for the last 16 months.

Thirteen days ago, the 28-year-old former UCLA philosophy instructor walked out of the Santa Clara County jail in nearby Palo Alto-free on $102,500 bail.

Instead of foling the "Free Angela," campaign, supporters of the black militant announced during a break in her murder-kidnap trial last week that they were shifting into "higher gear."

As a first order of business, the National United Committee to Free Angela Davis and All Political Prisoners announced a nationwide campaign to remove her court-imposed bail restrictions.

Committee co-chairman Franklin Alexander said it is unconstitutional to prohibit Miss Davis from traveling outside the six counties of the San Francisco Bay area and speaking at public meeings or rallies without court permission.

Alexander said Miss Davis wants to be free to travel during breaks in her trial on murder, kidnap and conspiracy charges stemming from the Aug. 7, 1970, shootout at the Marin County Civic Center in which four persons were killed.

A tentative panel of eight women and four men is undergoing intensive questioning, but jury selection is expected to take at least five or six weeks. The trial started last Monday.

Miss Davis' supporters said freedom to speak and travel would enable her to participate in the massive fund raising campaign for her defense.

"Pretrial publicity has prejudiced every living soul in this country," Alexander said. "The only way it can be removed is if they see her in the flesh."

The committee also called on the public to demand that the $744,000 security network for the trial-including a 10-foot wire fence, special lights and metal detectors be scrapped.

But the committee said its overriding goal now is full and complete freedom for Miss Davis.

Last year, the committee raised and spent $100,000 "for helping to build a mass movement around Angela and all political prisoners," Alexander said.

The committee operates from a storefront office in downtown San Jose and has offices in several major cities.

Among those listed as "national sponsors" are the Rev. Ralph Davis Abernathy, Georgia Rep. Julian Bond, Bernadette Devlin, actress Jane Fonda, actor Elliott Gould, Coretta S. King, and Communist party chairman Gus Hall.

Douglas Cross-Examination This Week In Berrigan Trial

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP) — Government witness Boyd Douglas is expected to face vigorous cross-examination this week into his role as FBI informer which led to the indictments of the Rev. Philip Berrigan and six others on federal antiwar conspiracy charges.

The chief defense attorneys, Leonard Boudin and Ramsey Clark, have indicated they will attempt to discredit Douglas.

In his opening statement several weeks ago, Clark accused Douglas of being an impersonator and making up stories. The defense is expected to emphasize that the prosecution has presented no witnesses to corroborate Douglas' testimony.

Douglas, 31, returns to the witness stand Monday to wind up direct examination by government prosecutor William Lynch.

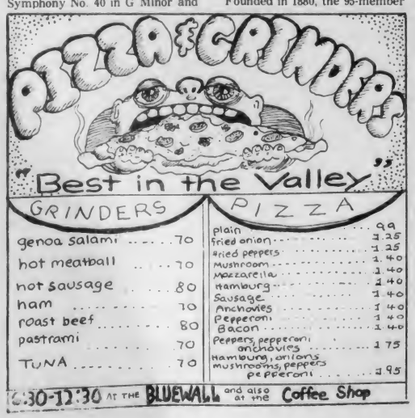
The government's star witness, Douglas has testified that Berrigan and his codefendants plotted to kidnap presidential aide Henry Kissinger, blow up Washington heating tunnels and destroy draft records at various Selective Service centers.

Douglas says he acted as a mail courier for Berrigan and, when discovered, became an informer for the FBI.

During Friday's trial sessions, letters reportedly written to and from Berrigan and intercepted by Douglas were read to the jury.

The Saint Louis Symphony Orchestra.

Orchestra Concert Tonight



The Saint Louis Symphony Orchestra concert in Curry Hicks Cage tonight, March 6, will feature Mozart & Mahler.

The concert is sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Council at 8 p.m. in Curry Hicks Cage as the final event of the Celebrity Series.

Included in the concert will be Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Symphony No. 40 in G Minor and Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 9.

Concert tickets range in price from $1 to $3.50, and may be purchased at the Fine Arts Council Office, 125 Herter Hall, Tel. 545-0202. Though remaining tickets will be on sale at the main door of the Cage immediately before the concert, the early purchase of tickets will assure quick admittance and seating.

Founded in 1880, the 95-member Orchestra is the second oldest symphony in the United States. It has maintained an excellent musical tradition in St. Louis for nearly a century, in addition to having taken its place among the world's foremost orchestras.

Zulfikar Appointment A Move Toward Peace

DACCA (AP) — President Zulfikar Ali Bhutto's appointment of Gen. Tikka Khan to command the Pakistani army appears to be the ironic first major step toward a peace settlement on the subcontinent, Bengali sources who have been close to Bhutto and the army suggested Sunday.

They say the appointments of Tikka to replace Lt. Gen. Gul Hassan Khan and of Air Marshal Zafar Choudhury to replace air force commander A. Rahim Khan mean that for the first time since Gen. Mohammed Ayub Khan commanded the army in 1951, service chiefs are accountable directly to a civilian ruler.

Bhutto's show of force in firing two men who last December played a major role in making his president apparently gives him a strong position over national Awami League President Khan Abdul Wali Khan, the Pathan leader who has been Bhutto's principal critic and with whom Bhutto now is meeting in Rawalpindi.

Bhutto's moves in the past week also for the first time put him in a position to consider trading terms for 93,000 troops and about 12,000 West Pakistani civilians captive in India.

Peking Expanding Foreign Assistance

WASHINGTON, March 4 — Peking is reportedly providing considerable new economic aid to developing countries around the world as well as reactivating suspended programs elsewhere under its increasingly active policy of asserting leadership of the "third world."

In addition, according to newly available data, China continues to supply military and economic aid to North Vietnam, and, for the first time since 1953,is giving military assistance to North Korea. Arms are also being shipped to Albania and, under a recent agreement, to the leftist Government of the former French Congo, in Brazzaville.

During 1971, China also sharply raised the level of international relief aid dispensed by the Chinese Red Cross with a total of more than $10-million in donations to disaster-struck nations from Afghanistan to Chile and Turkey.

In 1970, China became the Communist world's principal supplier of economic aid to developing countries, greatly outstripping the Soviet Union, as she resumed the assistance activities interrupted by the Cultural Revolution.

According to a study issued last December by the State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research, the Chinese aid commitments to developing nations reached $709-million in 1970 compared with $204-million by the Soviet Union.

A preliminary survey of the Chinese foreign economic assistance for 1971, made available in Western intelligence quarters, showed that while total commitments last year were below the 1970 levels, the flow of aid has become highly diversified, even including countries with which China has no formal diplomatic relations.

The pattern in 1972 appeared to be basically unchanged in growing economic assistance and selective military aid.

In the case of Pakistan, for example, China converted $100-million of a $200-million loan, granted in 1970 for development projects, into an outright grant when President Zulfikar Ali Bhutto visited Peking early last month. Premier Chou En-lai also deferred the repayment of the balance of the loan and promised additional lending as required.

Specialists in Chinese affairs note that during the last year Peking has signed aid agreements for the first time with Chile, Guyana and Peru in South America; Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopa, Mauritania, Sierra Leone, Somalia and the Sudan in Africa; Iraq in the Middle East, and Ceylon in Asia.

Whereas the bulk of the 1970 assistance was made up of the $200-million Pakistani loan and of $200-million loans each to Tanzania and Zambia for the Tanzam railway, the credits last year were spread widely.

Ethiopia, for instance, received an $80-million loan for agricultural development and Iraq $40-million for industrial expansion. The Sudan was granted $40 million in credits for mining and agriculture in addition to a $40- million loan given the year before.

Peru—the first non-Communist Latin-American country to obtain aid from China — was given $42-million in aid, mainly for the mining industry. Peking has supplied assistance to Cuba since 1960.

In most instances, trade agreements and the exchange of permanent trade missions accompanied the aid pacts. Western specialists assumed that Chinese advisers would be sent to the countries where Peking-financed projects are underway.

Peking's aid to its Eastern European friends, Albania and Rumania, is also believed to have grown in 1971.

While no figures are available, Peking was reported to be granting Albania interest-free loans for her 1971-75 five-year plan.

Three protocols were signed with Rumania last year for the disbursement of a major interest-free loan, estimated by specialists at $244-million, formally granted in November, 1970. In October, 1971, another loan for an unknown amount was granted Rumania for industrial development.

Island Of Love On Verge of War

NICOSIA (AP) — Cyprus, the legendary island of love on the verge of civil war through political hatreds, is a welter of contradictory confusions.

The involution of local politics is such that nothing is clear.

At any given moment, opposites join sides, those in agreement become opposed and the in-betweens become extremes.

This beautiful, prosperous and predominantly Greek Mediterranean island has been brought to the brink of civil war again by Gen. George Grivas, the former leader of the Greek Cypriot EOKA underground.

The 74-year-old general returned secretly to Cyprus from banishment in Athens last September and has been organizing a do-or-die campaign for enosis-union with Greece.

President Archibishop Makarios and the ruling junta in Greece agree that enosis is unfeasible because Turkey threatens to go to war if it is attempted. A fifth of the island's population is of Turkish background.

So Premier George Papadopoulos, of Greece and Markarios pursue a publicly proclaimed joint policy for a compromise settlement of the Cyprus problem.

But Papadopulos, anxious to restore relations between Atlantic Alliance partners Greece and Turkey, which have become strained by the Cyprus problem, has lost patience with Makarios.

The Greek premier wants to oust Makarios or turn him into a puppet, because the Archbishop refused to make more constitutional concessions to the Turkish Cypriot side. Makarios fears acceptance of Papadopoulos' terms might lead to partition.

Yet, oddly enough, the staunchly pro-enosis Grivas faction in Cyprus, which is against Makarios because he wants to compromise with the Turkish side, is enthusiastically backing Papadopoulos, who wants to oust Makarios because he is not going far enough.

At the same time, the Greek junta backs Grivas against Makarios, though Grivas has stated he is determined to achieve enosis at any cost, presumably even if this meant a Greek-Turkish war.

Makarios won an overwhelming 95 per cent of the vote when he was opposed by a pro-Grivas, pro-enosis candidate four years ago. In an ultimatum to Makarios last month, however, the Greek junta demanded that he form a government of national unity, to include representatives of the Grivas faction.

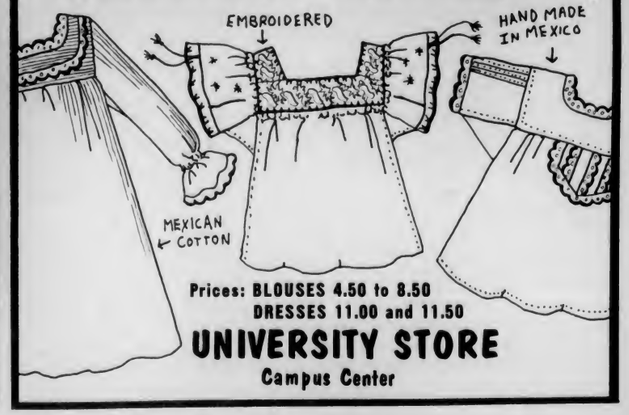
The Greek Cypriot public regarded this as a truly bizarre move. For the Greek junta, which seized power in a coup in 1967, has not only rejected demands for the formation of a national unity government in Greece, but has jailed former politicians for making such a suggestion.

Thieu Says War in 'New' Stage

SAIGON (AP) — President Nguyen Van Thieu says the Vietnam war is entering a new phase in which government forces must put more emphasis on counter guerrilla warfare to fight for and hold territory.

In ordering special stress on the war in the populated countryside, Thieu has chided province chiefs for laxity and laid down new rules for improving government security and control at the local level.

Among these is a decree that village and hamlet chiefs are "absolutely forbidden" to sleep anywhere but in their own villages.



It has been common practice for officials in insecure areas to spend only daylight hours there, for fear of nighttime assassination by the Viet Cong.

Many U.S. advisers contend that the best measure of a village or hamlet's security is whether the chief stays there at night.

"If a hamlet chief abandons his hamlet, this hamlet must be regarded enemy," Thieu said. "A hamlet chief who leaves...to protect himself is a hamlet chief who connives with the Communists."

Thieu's orders were issued in meetings during the past week with regional military commanders, chiefs of the 44 provinces and other officials to study the military and political situation.

ADAM 26 Exposes Federal Agency

(LNS) — Eustacio Francisco Martinez, former chairman of the National Chicano Moratorium Committee, recently revealed himself as former agent (code Name) ADAM 26 for the Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms Enforcement Division of IRS of the U.S. Treasury Department (ATF).

At a news conference conducted last month by two Los Angeles organizations, Casa de Carnalismo (Brotherhood House) and the Citizens Research and Investigation Committee (CRIC), Martinez said "I stopped working for the government when I realized how corrupt they are, how they're really against the people. I once thought I was doing the right thing by working for the government and against these organizations (Chicano activist groups) but now I see they are really only trying to divide the people."

Among the many charges of illegal activities carried out by ATF, the FBI and the Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD), Martinez pointed to the myth that the ATF was established to control liquor and prohibit drug traffic. He asserts that ATF is really "not interested in stopping drugs but in perpetuating them so our people will not unite as a working force. They hire addicts to disrupt the people's movements and support their habits."

Chief Special Investigator Alfred T. Sutlick of ATF refused to admit or deny that Martinez worked for them or to answer any question saying, "Washington, D.C., has ordered us not to make any comment." During the news conference, Marilyn Katz of CRIC spoke of the ever increasing "repression; provocation whose purpose is to destroy legitimate, legal organizations and movements of people fighting for change: fighting against the status quo."

Martinez' intricate story was also unfolded at the news conference. In Oct. 1971, he contacted Isabel Rodriguez, mother of seven members of Casa de Carnalismo, and told her he was an "informer and agent provacateur for ATF" and was willing to give evidence for the defense in the case of Los Tres del Barrio--three Chicanos recently framed and convicted in L.A. for shooting a federal narcotics agent.

Martinez was subsequently interviewed by defense lawyers and prominent members of the Chicano community. Mike McCarthy of CRIC went to Houston, Texas where Martinez got his start and checked out part of his story. All those directly involved with Martinez corroborated the essence and many details of the story.

Martinez was arrested in Houston in July of 1969 for illegal possession of a weapon. He had just been released from a mental hospital for "a nervous breakdwown," following a tour of duty in the Army as a "foot soldier."

Tito Garcia contacted the 21-year-old man, identifying himself as an agent for ATF. Garcia allegedly told Martinez that he would not be charged with anything if he would work as an informant and agent provacateur for that agency.

For more than a year, Martinez did just that, infiltrating the Houston and Kingsville, Texas chapters of the Brown Berets and Mexian American Youth Organization (MAYO), the initial forces behind La Raza Unida Party.

He freely admits to "acts of provocation and violence" in his role as a "militant Chicano leader." Martinez and Garcia tried to set up a gun purchase at the University of Texas A&M with members of the local MAYO. Martinez created dissention within the Brown Berets and MAYO throughout Texas. He burned a cross in front of the home of Katie Brooks' a Vista worker in Houston. Later he burned down her whole house.

During protest marches in Alice, Texas in September, 1969 called to bring attention to educational problems of Chicanos, Martinez tried to disrupt activities by jumping on a car and trying to cave the top in. He wanted to direct the march away from its course.

Martinez used this tactic again in East L.A. in Oct. 1970 while disrupting a speech of Senator John Tunney a "Kennedy liberal." He not only attempt to cave in the top of a car driven by one of Tunney's aides, but he also kicked Tunney and beat the assistant. Then he shut off the sound system, causing chaos and disrupting the whole rally.

As a result of his work in Texas and because of growing suspicion about his activities, Martinez was transferred to Los Angeles by ATF in Oct. 1970, a few weeks after Ruben Salazar's death. (Salazar was the journalist shot by the police during a Chicano moratorium demonstration while sitting in a bar) Martinez told newspeople that Salazar's death was looked upon by ATF and LADP agents, whom he got to know afterward, "as part of life."

His new assignment was to "infiltrate and disrupt" the national office of the Chicano Moratorium, an effective anti-war Chicano organization.

Martinez was immediately able to establish himself as a "militan no-nonsense Chicano" and was able to discredit Rosalio Munoz (a big leader of the Chicano Moratorium) by spreading false rumors about him. Agent Martinez was soon made chairman of the Moratorium committee. He also became a major leader in the Brown Berets, and because of his important position was able to supply intelligence information to ATF and LAPD.

Martinez said that one of his assignments was to consistently advocate the use of illegal weapons and acts of violence. During the period some of his activities included: causing the arrest of a woman demonstrator by creating a disturbance on a picket line at Hollenbeck Police Station; stealing letters and other documents from the Moratorium office, and parading in front of the Moratorium office, Nov. 4, 1970 with a 410 caliber shotgun, provoking a police raid on the building. During the raid one Moratorium worker suffered a fractured skull, several other Chicano youths were injured, and many arrested and subsequently given jail terms.

His last assignment was to infiltrate Casa de Carnalismo. Martinez was to help "identify leading militants" whom his supervisors, ATF agents Jim Riggs and Fernando Ramos, contended were both Carnalismo members and "CLF" (Chicano Liberation Front) members bent on destroying "the system by violence and bombings."

Martinez learned that Carnalismo's members were "peaceful and law abiding" and that their program "was one of serving the people: ridding the community of drugs and educating everybody. Whenever I would tell this to the ATF they would laugh at me."

What cinched Martinez' doubt about his assignment was when he was ordered to infiltrate a narcotic addict known as "Nacho" into Carnalismo.

Martinez also talked about an "international conspiracy of 'law enforcement' agencies." He said that the United States not only aided the Mexican Police in their "massacre of 500 students during the Olympics there" but that "in exchange" Mexican federal agents participated in a raid in East L.A. for training purposes."

Collins Fights Draft Prosecution

TEXARKANA, Tex. (LNS) — Although the establishment press has shown increased interest in amnesty for draft resisters in Canada and Sweden, there has been considerably less discussion of those draft resisters in federal prisons across the country.

One of the earliest and most militant black resisters against the Vietnam war, Walter Collins, is now one-fourth the way through a five year sentence in this Texas facility. Since the U.S. Supreme Court has rejected his appeal, Collins hopes for release before November, 1975 rest on a new appeal against the army's failure to explain that he could apply for a CO discharge after induction or on some form of amnesty.

Collins, a 26-year-old activist in the black liberation movement, lost his student deferment in 1966, soon after he began organizing against the Vietnam war. After being given the wrong information when he applied for his CO, he showed up at his induction center twice and passed out anti-draft literature.

He was later indicted on six counts of refusing induction and convicted of five. Collins received two five year sentences, to be served concurrently, and a $2000 fine.

Collins appealed the conviction on the grounds that the board was all-white and improperly constituted. Of the five board members, only one lived in the area that it served and the chairman lived in another county--in direct violation of the Selective Service Act.

But like Lee Otis Johnson and John Sinclair, Walter Collins was a troublemaker who had to be put away. As early as 1962, he was involved in sit-ins in the South. He later worked in voter registration drives across the deep South in places like Laurel, Mississippi. In 1966, he began organizing resitance to the Vietnam war in the black community of New Orleans. Since then, he served as a staff member of the Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF) and Southern regional director for the National Association of Black Students (NABS).

Army Women Speak Out

(LNS Editor's note: The following article is excerpted from Army Dependents Speak: Women and the Military.)

WHAT ARE YOUR THOUGHTS ABOUT WOMEN WHO JOIN THE MILITARY, AND WHAT ARE GI'S ATTITUDES TOWARDS WOMEN WHO JOIN THE MILITARY?

You can't talk about women in the military without talking first about the officers who have life and death control over all enlisted men and women. In Andy Stapp's book Up Against the Brass he talks about a "pig party." When officers graduate from Officers Candidate School, there is an initiation, like a fraternity initiation, where the officers go into town near where they are stationed and they find what they consider the ugliest girls that they can and invite them to this party. During the party, the head of a pig is presented on a tray to who they consider the ugliest girl there.

This is the attitude officers have toward women, and they are the people with power in the military. They judge us on our looks as though we're objects, not human beings, and they feel they have the right to do this.

How you are treated depends on the rank of your husband--the power of the man you're with. They say "officers and their ladies, noncommissioned officers and their wives, enlisted men and their women." Male supremacy exists in all parts of society, and this includes enlisted men, but the officers purposely play upon this when training enlisted men, to make them more hostile towards women.

I think this is done purposely, to keep GIs demoralized, separated from women, and confused so that they will do the army's work, and won't organize with their families and their sisters in the military.

Guerilla Leader Killed, Mexican Movement Grows

(LNS Editor's note: The present Mexican government boasts about its liberal ideas--"let's go back to enforcing the revolutionary laws"--but has hardly kept its promises. Mexican president Luis Echeverria, who was minister of interior in the past government, was the man direcly responsible for the massacre at Tatelolco in October of 1968 during the demonstrations against the Olympics.)

Meanwhile the guerrilla struggles in the countryside and cities of Mexico have just begun to connect with each other. But because of an effective news blackout, most North Americans don't know anything about them.

There are guerrilla movements in Chihuahua, the central region of the north; Nuevo Leon, which borders with the southern part of Texas; Vera Cruz in the Gulf of Mexico, and west of Mexico City; the Yucatan Peninsula; Aguas Calientes, in the central part of the country; and most recently in the state of Chiapas, which borders with Guatemala.)

MEXICO CITY (LNS)--Genaro Vazquez Rojas, the strongest of the guerrilla leaders in Mexico, was killed by government forces at dawn on February 2 while driving on the highway between Mexico City and Morelia (about 150 miles apart).

Since 1969, Vazquez Rojas had been carrying out rural guerrilla actions in the state of Guerrero, the home of Acapulco, located south of Mexico City. He was commander in chief of an organization called the Asociacion Civica Nacional Revolucionaria (National Revolutionary Civic Assoc.), known among the people simply as the guerrilleros Vazquez Rojas. The campesinos gave him tremendous support and the government was unable to crush him despite many efforts. In 1971, half of the Mexican Army was sent out to destroy his forces but they failed.

According to information received from Prensa Latina (the Cuban press agency), national highway police killed Vazquez Rojas on February 2 in an armed clash near the city of Morelia. His body was secretly flown on a military airplane from Morelia to an air base outside Mexico City. That same plane brought two persons who were in the car with him and who were not identified. They were taken to the hospital, in serious condition.

The government has given another version of his death. They say that he died from injuries caused by a car accident. Two autopsies were performed on his body, the second one by military doctors, who say that they found no bullet wounds in his body. The government used this report to support the official account of his death--but the people do not believe this story.

In the last few years, and especially the last few months, guerrilla struggle has increased tremendously in many parts of Mexico. In October, 1968, during a demonstration protesting the Olympics, government forces shot down students, workers, old men, women and children at Tlatelolco in Mexico City, killing at least 300 and wounding more than 1,000. Many people then decided that it was impossible to bring about any real change except by underground actions and armed struggle. They also deciced it was necessary to increase action by both campesinos and workers--not only students.

Some people went into the countryside while others carried out actions in the cities, such as assaults on banks and other commerical institutions. Last year, urban guerrilla warfare increased to the point where many banks had to be protected by soldiers and police.

Genaro Vazquez Rojas, 38 years old, was born in a Guerrero village, the son of a campesino leader. He went to study in Mexico City and while he was there he never lost contact with his people.

Because of his successful organizing activity amont the campesinos, the local government forces arrested Vazquez Rojas in 1966 and he was sentenced to life imprisonment. His lawyers were threatened with death. Plans to kill him inside the prison failed because the people always managed to warn him in advance.

In April, 1968, the Asociacion Civica Nacional carried out a commando attack on the prison and he was freed. From that time on, the government fought his forces and tried to kill him. In an interview published in the Mexican magazine Por Que? last July, Vazquez Rojas explained the goals of the Asociacion.

They are: overthrow of the government of big landholders and big capitalist companies; creation of a popular government of campesinos, workers, students, progressive intellectural and working people in general; full economic and political independence; establishing a just society that will benefit the working peoples who form the majority of the Mexican population. The Asociacion also seeks solidarity with other peoples in other countries who are fighting U.S. imperialism.

About 10 days before Vazquez Rojas was killed, his wife was kidnapped and imprisoned. Their 6 children were left in the care of elderly relatives. His wife was released recently.

After Genaro was killed, hundreds of people came to her to express their sorrow. She has said:——"The heritage left by my husband is the memory of a father who put aside all his personal interests in order to struggle for the poor people."

On The Up and Up

We urge you to join in a drive to let your legislator know where you stand on the issues of a tuition increase at this University and other state colleges.

Tomorrow morning the Education Committee will hold hearings on these bills. Your state legislator will have the final say, however. Let him know how you feel, he should act in accordance with his constituents' views.

According to USCC, there are four types of bills being presented to the legisature: Tuition based on percentage of instructional cost, income of family or student, instructional cost percentage with deferred payment, and free tuition.

When choosing which to support, if any, one should remember that money from tuition increases will not necessarily be earmarked for education. And even if this year's legislature so earmarks tuition funds, future legislature might not.

To make it possible to get to your legislator, the Collegian and University and State Communications Council will publish this week, a current list of all state legislators and the district which they represent. Also, a sample form and additional information on tuition increase bills will be presented.

Find out what its all about, then let your legislator know how you feel about it. .

Faith in Good Will of The People

It may come as a surprise to some, but the Student Senate has very limited resources. This has become most blatantly apparent in the dispute over whether the $8000 now allocated to the Concert Committee (for a free Spring Concert) should be instead allocated to Students Offering Support. SOS is a student group raising money to pay legal expenses for a class-action suit against the Belchertown State School. Because the Senate does have limited resources, the issue has been reduced to a very difficult choice that will test the true values of the whole student community.

Taken at face value, the issue may seem simple. The contrast between helping suffering children and engaging in a self-indulgent musical orgy is apparent, and most people of conscience and goodwill would choose the former. But the issue just isn't that simple.

Behaving muce like religious fanatics, advocates of a free concert and advocates of SOS have attempted to convert the heathens to their own particular persuasion. Few people have been seriously trying to find out how the issues can be reconciled to the satisfaction of both parties.

In order to approach the issue with some degree of rationality, we first must dispel some myths. The two most prevalent myths are: (a) all students want a concert instead of SOS funding, and (b) all students want SOS funding and don't want a concert. Like all consumer-oriented Americans, we want both. Both would be important to the student body, although each for different reasons. SOS merits students support because it translates our good intentions into firm commitments. The Concert Committee deserves support because a good time is fun, and fun is beneficial to everyone's mental health (especially in an institution as joyless as UMass.) There is a strange Puritan ethic at work in the minds of SOS supporters, who seem to really believe that self-indulgence is ipso facto criminal. If that was so, we should ban all forms of entertainment (including dope and liquor) and demand that all the money we would spend for it go to social service agencies. In practice, none of us subscribe to that notion.

Another myth that must be dispelled is the notion that an individual student with a cause speaks on behalf of the student body. This becomes painfully apparent to me when confronted with leaders from SOS and the Concert Committee. Even though they hold contradictory positions, they can both offer convincing arguments and evidence of strong student support. Neither can presume to speak for all students.

If the Senate allocates the $8000 outright to SOS, we are opening a Pandora's box of issues. Student tax money is technically state money. Legally, it is a state tax, just like the sales tax. By using that money to support a suit against the state, we will be on questionable legal grounds. At the very least, the money so allocated could not be spent until extensive negotiations are conducted with the administration, or the Board of Trustees, or perhaps higher authorities. Aside from those difficulties, we will be creating state-wide political hassles for the university at precisely the time we are appealing to the state government to refrain from increasing tuition and to restore the recent devastating budget cuts. That is a high price to pay. If we decide to pay it, we must be willing to take the consequences.

By shifting all of the funds to SOS, we are also giving a stern slap in the face to the many students who have worked and dreamed since October to make a free Spring Concert a reality. Driven only by vision and enthusiasm, these people have negotiated and negotiated with recalcitrant administrators and have squeezed, like water from a stone, the necessary funds from the parsimonious Student Senate. We cannot flippantly turn our backs on these people.

Because we are facing these very real difficulties, several members of the Senate have been engaged in the difficult process of forgoing a compromise between the absolutes presented by the concert advocates and the SOS advocates. Those efforts have been largely successful, so that next Wednesday's Senate meeting will consider three alternatives:

(1) $8000 to SOS; No concert.

(2) No SATF funds to SOS; the free concert would be a benefit for SOS with voluntary contributions solicited from those attending the concert.

(3) $6000 for the Concerts; $2000 to SOS for organizational purposes but not for legal fees; the free concert would still be a benefit for SOS-contributions could be used for legal fees.

These are the choices. In the light of the above-mentioned problems, the third alternative seems to be the best way to have a good Spring Concert and still make a major commitment to SOS (without legal hassles.) The seond alternative is the second-best option, since it keeps the concert and still gives significant voluntary support for SOS. The first alternative supports SOS, but invites intense political and legal conflict over use of state funds and denies the student body a concert.

I have faith that the Student Senate, as the representative body of students, can resolve the issue fairly. I only hope that the Senate can avoid the unnecessary parliamentary hassles and ego-tripping that too often obstruct its deliberations.

My Set Is Broken

"How'd This One Get In Here? — 'Re-Elect Nixon'!"

(Herblock is on vacation)

WASHINGTON–It was two days after President Nixon's return from China and the family went into the living room after dinner to watch television.

My wife turned on the set and said, "That's funny. There seems to be something wrong with the TV. I can't get Nixon on the tube."

"Try another channel," I suggested.

She switched to another channel and got a private-eye program. "He's not on this channel either."

I rose from my chair and started fiddling with the dials myself. I tried all the channels–no Nixon. "Who has been messing around with this set?" I shouted.

The kids were very defensive. "We didn't touch it," my son said.

My daughters also denied having done anything with it. "Dammit," I said, "we could turn on this set any time day or night on any channel and get a picture of Nixon. Now we can't even get him on educational TV."

"Maybe the cleaning woman did something wrong," my wife suggested. "I told her not to touch it."

Fuming, I called up my TV repairman, George Cury, and asked him to come over right away.

He asked if it could wait until the next day.

"Not on your life," I said. "I haven't missed Nixon on television in three years, and I'm not about to start tonight."

George came over with his tool kit. "I can't understand it," I said. "Nixon has been coming in loud and clear on prime time every evening. But tonight all I can get is a movie, Dean Martin and a Lucy rerun."

Mr. Cury said, "Let me try." He flipped the dial back and forth. "You're right. There's something definitely wrong. Maybe it's in the aerial."

Mr. Cury climbed up on the roof and came back down. "The aerial seems to be all right. It's pointing toward China. You say you have had no trouble up until this week?"

"Right," I replied. "We watched his arrival at Andrews Air Force Base loud and clear in living color."

"Maybe it's in the tube," Mr. Cury said.

"What would a TV tube have to do with it?" I asked.

"Well, what happens is that when these tubes are installed they emit a very strong Nixon signal; but as time goes on the filament wears thin, the tube gets weaker and weaker. On some of the older sets people can't get Nixon at all. But this is a fairly new one, and you should be able to receive an image of Nixon even if it's only a shadow of himself."

Mr. Cury checked the tube and shook his head. "It's not there. Maybe there is something wrong with your horizontal adjuster. On some sets when Nixon starts fading from the screen the trouble can be found with the horizontal dial. Tell me. The last time you saw Nixon was he standing up or lying down?"

"I think he was standing up," I said.

"Then maybe, it's the vertical dial." Mr. Cury worked for three hours on the back of the set while we all waited nervously for him to fix it. Finally, he turned it on again. We got Dick Cavett, Johnny Carson, Perry Mason and an old Wallace Beery movie. But still no Nixon.

Mr. Cury shook his head. "There's nothing I can do. You're going to have to throw away the TV."

"But it's only a year old," I protested.

"It's not my fault you got a lemon," he said. "It's obvious there is a weak Nixon fuse somewhere, but I can't fine it."

"What will you give me on a trade-in?" I asked.

"Are you crazy?" he said, "for a set that can't even get Nixon in the daytime, I wouldn't give you a dime."

Letters To The Editor

Jump On The Bandwagon

To the Editor:

I would like to write in reference to Mark Dlugosz's letter in Friday's Collegian. First of all, a federal judge has ordered the state to implement 16 proposals that were written into the suit. The state is now appealing that decision. If it stays in court (the only reason why it wouldn't, would be a financial one), then the state has to follow the directive of the court. If they don't, they have to answer to the federal government, as well as a growing number of community supporters.

Maybe, some students are jumping on the bandwagon because the governor cut Boltwood's funds. Why shouldn't they? The governor is trying to curtail student involvement in state institutions; partly because of what we are doing and partly because he wants to avoid other scandals that could possibly arise as a result of student involvement.

This is a class action suit, brought against the state by 28 parents of residents of Belchertown. By the nature of a class action suit all members of that class will benefit if the case is won. Also this could be an important precedent to other similar cases. Court cases require extensive financial resources; especially one that involves publicity to state officials. They are going to stall as long as possible until our funds are diminished. Twenty eight parents alone couldn't possibly finance this case no matter what their resources are.

Why the concert? First of all because there is absolutely no other money available in the Senate for this semester. Secondly, because it would be a nice idea if we gave something that we would really want, to help people who are in desperate need.

There is a very good reason for us to "give up our selfish concert interests" to ease "suffering at Belchertown". Just the fact that there is suffering is reason enough. People being deprived of their basic human rights and needs is reason enough. Children not getting the help they need to get themselves out of the institution (eventually) is reason enough. People not getting proper medical facilities or nutritional and sanitary meals is reason enough. Any one who has ever been to Belchertown knows that I could go on forever.

If we keep up our fight through the court, then we will win and the people at Belchertown ultimately will benefit. We can't win without your support. That is all we are asking.

Bittersweet Sylvan

To the Editor:

Life is not sweet in Sylvan, especially since the new emergency system was installed in the elevators. For the lucky people who are not acquainted with this ingenious system, every time the "emergency" button is pushed both elevators go to the first floor where they remain until someone from the Physical Plant comes up (the next day) to fix them. The emergency button is right out in the open, with an inviting "IN EMERGENCY, PRESS AND TALK" inscribed below it.

The elevators remain dormant at least five times per week, in each dorm. Needless to say, everyone in the area is fuming. For close to a month, the only thing the area government has done is to tell the residents that it's not nice to push the button. I do not know who is pushing the damn button; I do know that I am very tired and angry from walking eight flights of stairs, every day, for no valid reason. It is my opinion that if anyone is to blame it is they who have installed this idiotic system. I have heard the arguments about why, by law, the system must stay. They are hard to believe, but, even so, they do not justify the constant elevator breakdown. If the system must stay then let's have some improvements!! A temporary solution would be to install a "break-glass, pull lever" set-up similar to fire alarms.

Many Sylvan residents were put here involuntarily, we pay more money to live here than anywhere else on campus. It is about time we received something in return!

Effective-and How

To the Editor:

In view of the recent events concerning S.O.S. and the Concert Committee I can only agree with sentiments already expressed; the situation is absurd. Upon evaluating and weighing the purposes and goals of the two groups it is contemptible that the Concert Committee gets handed 8000 plus dollars, while S.O.S. must beg and scrimp for 95 dollars–to plead for support to affect the lives "of those that can't help themselves."

The real shame of the whole thing is not that S.O.S. has to expend enormous amounts of time and energy raising money to attack the injustices at one state "Hospital", but that there are scores of other "Belchertowns" outside our pampered community. There are innumerable instances of social injustices yet to be corrected, yet to be even realized. If the S.O.S. situation seems outrageous, we have yet to open our eyes. What is the answer? "When do we begin to help our children?" And How? Is it by cancelling concerts, sporting events, boogies, etc. for the next century?

This situation has clearly demonstrated to me, and hopefully to the entire student population, that if we are going to EFFECTIVELY change society by attacking existing injustices we must have EFFECTIVE and readily available means and resources with which to work as well as the commitment.

The answer seems to lie with the proposed WMPIRG or Western Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group. It is imperative that we the students support this idea as it can provide us the support we desperately need to remove the "hotbed of apathy" stigma.

But do we really need WMPIRG? Should you sign the petition? Should you support this organization? Ask those struggling and scrounging for S.O.S. Better yet, ask those at Belchertown.

Who Will Answer?

To the Editor:

Are we apathetic, as the Attorney General, Robert Quinn suggests? Will Governor Sargent get away with his 40% cut of Belchertown's budget? Who will answer these two supposed leaders of our commonwealth?

Will the three hundred volunteers of the Boltwood Project be left in the cold as the governor apparently wishes? Will they be forgotten by us, in the same manner that the children they love are being forgotten by the state? Who will answer for them?

The parents of the children need thousands of dollars in their fight against the state. Who will answer their needs? By giving our money for the Spring Concert to S.O.S. we can reply. We can answer. Our answer should be that we care. Will you answer? Will you care?

Misprint

To the Editor:

The second sentence in the second paragraph of my letter published on February 29, in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian was quite meaningless since a part of it was omitted by mistake, I assume. It should have read:

"To be sure all such outcomes are undesirable by a great deal less damaging than the violation of privacy under group pressure and the incompetent tinkering with the personalities and personal values of people which occur when people are pressured into sensitivity training guided by incompetents." (The part underlined was missing from the printed version.)

There were some other minor misprints which hopefully interfered less with the substance of the letter.

Barker Street Barons

To the Editor:

In my neighborhood in the south end of Hartford, I belonged to a gang called the "Barker Street Barons." I was twelve then. We were all twelve, thirteen, or fourteen, and not a very formidable group of warriors. In fact, the other gangs used to call us the "Barker Street Babies," an epithet that led us to receive many challenges of street combat, but the epithet was closer to the truth of things than what our name suggested, and we seldom accepted challenges, taking to heart the maxim about sticks and stones. But we did have values, we did have a code even at that age. It concerned snowballs: we threw only at each other or at other gangs or at policemen.

Now snowballs, perhaps, do not seem a very important subject, but if one walks down fraternity row, the importance becomes quite evident. And codes, too, because some of the good things about clubs, gangs, and fraternities concern the passage of the adolescent into manhood. They can help the adolescent in this passage. If the organization is strong enough, if the organization is not corrupt. I mean, fraternities do try to affirm the traditional values of our society, and I think a lot of the values, such as truth and honor, should not be treated as vestiges of a dying society. But perhaps I am getting to far afield of snowballs.

When one walks down Pleasant Street (fraternity row) and becomes the target of vollies of snowballs (remember, fraternities are organized) and, if one is a woman, the target of insults, of shouted propositions, one thinks: those damn fraternity boys! Emphasis not on "damn" but on "boys". And one is right, those are boyish, insecure acts. I remember at this mellow age of thirty having participated in snowball fights, even in one with over a thousand people, but everyone was willing to throw and be thrown at, and that's a big difference. And I knew I was being "boyish" then, and it was fun. There was no "machismo" involved, which takes us to the insults to passing women, if I may be allowed a measure of amateurish psychology. Now insults seldom get dates. And prowess with women is a fraternity image. Whether this is, in fact, true, is another matter, but it is the image. And what does one know about the insulter? That he is a little afraid of women. Forgive me Freud, Jung, Fromm, Miller, and Tom Simone.

So I am suggesting that the fraternities "get together" and hash the matter out: do you want to be considered men or boys? I think that there are a great many more men than boys involved, and I think the men will prevail.

Suggestions

To the Editor:

I feeel that the Spring Concert is the right of the students of the University of Mass. (they have paid fees and deserve the concert). I also believe that it is a sin to spend $8000-$1200 on a concert and ignore the plight of Belchertown State School. In an effort to solve this dilemma I would like to offer the following proposal: CHARGE A MODEST ADMISSION TO THE CONCERT, 50¢-$1.00, AND DONATE THE PROCEEDS TO BELCHERTOWN STATE SCHOOL. This proposal will provide the students with a good concert at a minimal charge and contribute funds to Belchertown. There is additional utility to the proposal because: 1) if the concert is for "charitable" or "benevolent" purposes there is the possibility of getting a performer or group to donate their time or perform for a reduced salary; 2) those people who are not members of the University community that are planning to attend the concert will also be contributing to Belchertown; 3) a precedent may be set and the possibilities for future concerts may be enhanced because of the dual function.

Barefeet and Ice Cream

It looks like the Physical Plant men are going to have to get off their shovels once more, as the barefoot and ice cream weather of last week has come to an end, in favor of slush and snow. The question becomes, when will the front of the Student Union look this good for keeps? (MDC photos by Gib Fullerton)

Busing Issue Helping Wallace

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Gov. Reubin Askew of Florida said Sunday that an antibusing resolution which he opposes has enchanced the chances of Alabama Gov. George Wallace winning next week's Florida primary.

Wallace had "a good chance of winning without the busing issue," Askew said. "It (the resolution) enhances his standing."

Askew was interviewed on the NBC TV-radio program "Meet the Press."

Askew said a Wallace victory would be "a setback in a certain sense for what I've been trying to achieve."

But he declined to criticize the Alabama governor or take a stand for or against any of the 11 candidates in the primary.

Askew has urged defeat of the antibusing resolution, which asks voters if they favor a constitutional amendment to prohibit forced busing.

It has no legal weight, nor does a companion resolution forced on the ballot by Askew. This asks voters whether they favor equal educational opportunity for all children.

Askew said also a statement from President Nixon on the busing issue would have a great effect on the March 14 Florida voting and he added he would welcome such a statement if Nixon opposes the idea of a constitutional amendment to ban busing.

Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota, meanwhile, discounted the importance of the Florida primary, where he said there were "11 candidates all running around trying to say who knows the most

However, McGovern said this Tuesday's voting in New Hampshire is very important because it will give the "first clear indications of grass roots" feeling toward him and Sen. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine.

McGovern would not say how much of the New Hampshire vote he feels he needs.

McGovern appeared on the ABC TV-radio program "Issues and Answers."

door in the morning, scanning the corridor to see whether a bathrobe is necessary," she complained.

The showers all have curtains and discretion is the order in most coed bathrooms, I was told. I had expected the Woodstock nation to be free of such prudish considerations.

Later on, I stopped by a lounge where some students were playing cards and others were engaged in chit chat.

"I think the freshmen are studying more than we ever did," one card player said.

"Yuh, there are sick people in every society," his partner in bridge rejoined.

When the game was over, I butted in, claiming to be new to the dorm. I asked whether they ever had any trouble with their roommates when they anticipated late-night trysts.

"Oh, no. You just warn your roommate in advance."

"We've grown pretty adept at diplomatic disappearances and well-timed illnesses."

"If your roommate isn't understanding, you can always plot to have him flunk out," said one young man.

"If advance warning is out, certain signals will do," a girl said. Like scotch tape over the keyhole or the proverbial tie lounging on the doorknob.

"Do some students still prefer to live in single-sex dorms?" I asked the group.

"Yes, but it's hard to say why. At least coed dorms are remotely like real life," someone answered.

"In men's dorms, the guys tend to be grosser. There's a lot of rough-housing. And the girls tend to be more catty in female dorms. There's also a lot more beauty-parloring," a student said.

"All-male dorms are the only place where you can still find guys willing to pile into a phone booth or swallow goldfish," he continued.

Single sex dorms were repeatedly characterized as a refuge for students who consider panty raids an indispensable aspect of college experience.

Just before I left UMass, I stopped by Butterfield, which prides itself on being the closest thing to Utopian coed dorm.

While no student there wanted to exchange coed living for sexual seclusion, one young man admitted, "Sometimes my lesser self longs for the old bravura between men."

"Coed living certainly kills the romanticism between the sexes," a girl said. "Dating has gone down the drain. I know a girl who has a date lined up for a few weeks from now. She has to wear a dress, the whole bit. She's petrified," she said. Nevertheless, she stressed that the retirement of romanticism was a small price to pay for more relaxed communication between the sexes.

And so, while coed living has resulted in the passing away of panty raids and formal dating, it is also sounding the requiem for certain aspects of the feminine and masculine sexual mystiques.

The behavior codes which compel women to passively await the attention of men and prompt men to back-slap and booze together, treating each other to hyperbolic accounts of sexual conquest, are no longer fashionable.

Gone, in other words, are certain social masks. In their stead, young men and young women are living together, with reckless disregard for the stereotypes which used to tyrannize the male-female mating dance.

Tourism Down In N. Ireland

DUBLIN (AP) — Hotel owners and tourist authorities warned Sunday that Ireland's turmoil is scaring away visitors, threatening many establishments with bankruptcy.

The Irish Hotels Federation reported many cancellations, both by private tourists and by international conferences and congresses.

Tourism is Ireland's second largest money earner, after agriculture. It brought in more than $265 million last year. British tourists contributed 33 per cent of it.

Bookings from Britain are falling away and the federation said many hotels will be forced to close down unless the Irish government helps out with cash.

"Over a month ago we sent out a circular to our 500 members asking them if they thought they would be forced out of business through lack of cash," F.X. Burke, director of the federation, told a news conference. "Ninety-three of them, about 20 per cent, said yes and gave details of the cash they may need."

If these hotels are to remain open by the end of the year the Irish government would have to give them up to $2.6 million, Burke said.

British businessmen also are dropping Ireland from their conference lists; nine British conferences have recently been canceled in Dublin, the Irish Tourist Board said.

In 1971, 1,115,000 visitors from Britain came to Ireland to spend a total of about $85.5 million, and 325,000 came from Northern Ireland, the third best market, after the United States.

"British people appear to be staying away for patriotic reasons," a tourism board spokesman said. "Unfortunately they have an exaggerated impression of what is happening here.

The quarrel is with the policies of the British government on Northern Ireland and is in no way reflected on the British as individuals."

Tourist officials estimated Ireland stands to lose about $52 million if the British and Americans stay away. And it could be more.

American tourists are expected to come in lesser numbers. The board expects a drop of 5 per cent. But West European visitors are still attracted by the emerald isle. West German tourists are expected to rise by 20 per cent on last year and Italians by 5 per cent.

Back in the '30s, the state got some funny ideas about where to put a new reservoir for Boston. In the process they flooded thirty-eight and a half square miles, wiping out four towns that used to be about ten miles from here. Who knows, maybe that's where the Pentagon got their Vietnam policies from. (Photo by Steve Schmidt)

Candidates Lose Jobs

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Comedian Pat Paulsen is running for president of the United States, population 200 million. Actor Ed Nelson wants to be a councilman in suburban San Dimas, population 15,000. It's keeping both off the air.

The Federal Communications Commission has ruled that television networks must give political opponents of the two men equal time whenever either appears on the tube in any capacity.

"I believe it violates my rights," Nelson says. "I T MEANS THAT TO HOLD PUBLIC OFFICE I have to give up my professional occupation."

Paulsen was a tongue-in-cheek candidate for president in 1968. This year he says he is seriously seeking the Republican presidential nomination, and the FCC has ruled he must be considered a serious candidate.

Paulsen filed suit in the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last Tuesday claiming that after he declared his candidacy he "began to suffer, almost immediately, severe economic damage." He asked that the FCC be prevented from enforcing its equal time ruling against him when he makes a "nonpolitical professional appearance."

Nelson says he is considering filing a similar appeal.

The television blackout is national for Paulsen, who is a candidate in Tuesday's presidential primary in New Hampshire. The blackout is only local for Nelson, but that's no comfort to him.

Nelson's troubles began when the National Broadcasting Co. showed a segment on its Night Gallery program called "Little Girl Lost" last Wednesday night. Nelson portrayed a mental patient's security guard in a role he said consumed 12 minutes.

Charles Wilson, one of the other six candidates for the April 11 San Dimas city council election, subsequently requested equal time during the 10 p.m. time slot.

"We are aware of the fact...that Ed is a candidate," said an NBC spokesman in Los Angeles. "Anything that Nelson is in will not be aired while he is still a candidate."

Nelson, who played Dr. Rossi in the television soap opera series Peyton Place for five years, also has a role in a two-hour NBC movie scheduled to be shown March 20 as the pilot for a new series.

But NBC said the movie won't be shown in the Los Angeles area while Nelson is a candidate.

Nelson said he couldn't drop out of the city council race under state law because he has already filed nomination papers.

The 43-year-old actor also claims his situation is somewhat different from Paulsen's because unlike the comedian, he doesn't portray himself.

Cheongsam Big in Hong Kong

HONG KONG (AP) — Adaptations of the coolie pajama, the classical mandarin gown, the slit-skirt cheongsam and the Mao-type peasant jacket vied for honors in the Chinese Look spotlight Sunday as Hong Kong opened its fifth annual ready-to-wear festival.

Coming only a week after President Nixon's China trip made headlines around the world, the festival has attracted nearly 300 foreign buyers from 30 nations.

Here in this city of four million Chinese, say sponsors of the event, the buyers are "seeing what the China look should look like-fashion adaptations of past and present Chinese garments."

Among the three-score styles presented at Sunday night's opening show:

—A coolie pajama like no coolie ever wore, close to it in style but with the top made of tan suede leather and the pants in smooth black leather.

—A richly brocaded, floor-length red Chinese silk gown in the classical mandarin style, with high neck and long, flowing sleeves.

—A black, wide-sleeved jacket, tied at the waist with a black leather cummerbund, and worn over a quilted velvet floor-length skirt in patchwork purple, red, black and white.

—A Japanese motif "kite dress' with huge Japanese Kabuki actor faces stenciled onto panel wings that dropped from outstretched sleeve to the floor.

—A slinky green and gold floor-length evening dress slit to the hip, with high collar topping a narrow, high, sleeveless and backless bodice.

—And, for men, a black velvet dressing gown, its entire front ablaze in a huge paisley pattern in turquoise and yellow embroidery.

The bulk of the sales, however, are expected to be in styles somewhat more subdued. "The Chinese look will be present but not quite so extreme," in the words of one festival official.

This more or less subdued styling is what most of the buyers are expected to be ordering in quantity for ready to wear stores and shops in North and South America and Europe.

Festival week and follow-up orders could hit $10 million to $12 million--maybe more--but even that would be only a fraction of this tiny British colony's ready to wear business for the year. Last year, January to December, Hong Kong's ready to wear experts were valued at slightly more than $1 billion.

Women's Lecture Today

"The Changing Role of Women in America" will be the topic of a lecture given Monday morning, 10-12 a.m., Room 162 of the Campus Center in conjunction with the Women's Cultural Festival to be held here March 6-12.

Florence Luscomb, a former suffragette, is being sponsored by the Southwest Women's Center as part of their role in the festival. Ms. Luscomb has been active in peace and labor movements and has been a delegate to several international peace conferences.

According to Eileen Stewart of the S.W. Center, UMass. women will sponsor skits, folk singing and a movie Tuesday, March 7, 1-4 p.m. in the Berkshire Clubroom. The movie, entitled "Anything You Want To Be" is a study in channelling of ambitions through sex-typing.

A career in law... without law school.

When you become a Lawyer's Assistant, you'll do work traditionally done by lawyers — work which is challenging, responsible and intellectually stimulating. Art Warren Is There To Help

By BETSY PEET AND JON SNOW

We have received some letters in response to our Food Service column, and we are hoping to receive many more from those who wish to comment on their dining commons or the Food Service Department. We too enjoy getting mail.

While we are waiting for the mail, we would like to tell you about Mr. Arthur Warren, who works as the Assistant Director of Food Services. He is another direct channel toward implementing your ideas or solving your problems.

Art, as he is better known around the department, really spends a lot of time talking with students in a public relations manner. He sees many students every day. Some have specific personal problems related to the Food Services Department, while others might have problems of a more general nature. Art Warren is in a good position to help students with unusual requests.

Exceptions to stated policy may be requested. Mr. Warren can speak for the Food Services Director and interpret policy matters. "Food Services attempts to be as flexible as possible within the broadest constraints," states Mr. Warren.

He is warm and interesting to talk with. Unlike some people in administrative positions who talk with the public and view it as an unpleasant task, he genuinely respects the other person's views and listens attentively.

Warren's background in Food Service includes working in many positions with organizations such as the Schrafft's chain of restaurants and the Hilton Hotels. Around the Food Services Department, he is known as the "Food Coach" as a result of his close friendship developed with many members of the Boston Patriots, while they trained last summer at UMass.

This is the man to see if you have any difficulties with your meal ticket. Either stop in at his office in Worcester Commons, or call 546-2472 if you have any questions. Mr. Warren will help you.

Is it the food, the constant complaints, or maybe a combination of both? Whatever the reason, Arthur Warren, Assistant Director of Food Services finds use of a good deal of Bromo Seltzer. (MDC photo by Alan Chapman)

Soda-Convenience vs. Ecology

Students seem to prefer convenience to ecology. This is the conclusion the Coalition for Environmental Quality (CEQ) has made, after investigating the soda vending system at UMass.

Three years ago, the Coke Bottling Co. of Northampton, which handles soda vending on this campus, changed from using paper cups to plastic ones due to student complaints. People affiliated with the machines got roughly four to five complaints due to soggy cups per day.

Today the move for greater convenience is on again, this time toward aluminum cans. There are now 16 Coke can machines on campus and seven dorms have requested new ones be installed to replace cup machines.

Health Center Loan Service

Do you have any orthopedic devices which you are no longer using? Would you like to donate them to a good cause? The Physical Therapy Department at the Health Center (Infirmary) is starting a free loan service for its patients who can't afford items which the health fee does not cover.

If you can help, bring the items to the Infirmary-Second Floor-Physical Therapy Department.

Thank you.

Forum To Focus On Wealth

The sixth in the series of eight forums in the University of Massachusetts-Amherst Great Decisions program will feature "Poor Nations and Rich Nations: Can the Gap be Narrowed?"

The broadcast, which will be heard live Wednesday, March 8, at 7:30 p.m. overradio WFCR (88.5 F.M.), will originate from the Noah Webster House Lounge on the UMass campus.

Moderator of the series is Luther A. Allen, associate professor of political science at UMass. Panelists this week will be Achlyn Lynch, associate professor, Afro-American Studies, UMass; Bruce Morris, dean, School of Home Economics, UMass; and Ernesto Zambrano, UMass School of Education.

The public is invited to attend and participate in the discussion series sponsored by Apple Corps, an Orchard Hill student residence organization on the UMass campus. Study material for the discussions is prepared by the Foreign Policy Association.

NES Having Trouble

The Northern Educational Service program is in danger of folding. The Office of Economic Opportunity has not promised to renew its funds. The program is also in danger of failing here on the campus due to dwindling support.

"We are unable to find people willing to work on the co-ordinating committee," Daryl Foster said next semester, of the four, five present committee members will be practice-teaching. Steve Nazzaro, a graduate student, will also be leaving.

Shifting responsibilities have thrown increasing work loads on the committee. The Springfield NES centers used to assign tutors and tutees at the outset of each semester. The committee now does this.

"The irresponsibility of the tutors consumes the most time," Judy Malone said.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

by SYDNEY OMARR

Cancer persons generally are loyal, wonderful during times of emergency and usually are capable of making a house a home. Natives of this zodiacal sign harmonize with Taurus, Virgo, Scorpio and Pisces. There is attraction to Capricorn, but the relationship is not without problems. Cancer should be wary in dealings with Libra and Aries. Cancer will protect family interests and usually will have something put aside for proverbial rainy day. Some famous persons born under this sign include Barbara Stanwyck, Dave Garroway and Bill Cosby.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Interests now range far and wide. But don't spread efforts to thin. One at a distance may make special request. Repay past favor. Avoid tendency to brood. Delay in travel plan is temporary.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Your ability to sift through and obtain facts is emphasized. You can impress and make solid gains. But you will have to do this despite opposition from one who is envious. Social contact results in ultimate profit.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Lie low. Listen, observe and learn. Don't rush in where others fear to tread. Includes signing of legal agreements. Wait and get lay of land. There will likely be hidden clauses. Added pressure, responsibility indicated.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Obtain hint from Gemini message. Maintain low profile. You get what is needed, but on a silver platter. Some adjustments are required. Make concession. Refuse to let pride stand in way of progress.

LEO (July 23-Aug 22): Domestic adjustment is required. Take nothing for granted. Let family member know that you are aware. Be especially considerate of young person who confides problem. Don't cast first stone. Message will become crystal-clear.

VIRGO (Aug.23-Sept. 22): Delay could ultimately work in your favor. Family members could quarrel. Don't be drawn into dispute. Those who ask your advice may merely be going through motions. Pisces person plays key role.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Forces tend to be scattered. Avoid wild goose chase. It might be best to postpone journey. There are responsibilities close at hand. Check reservations, calls, messages. Capricorn is involved.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Finish project. Expand horizons. Resist urge to borrow or lend money. Take inventory. Get accounting. Collect debts. Don't carry burden not rightly your own. You do have a right to live your own life.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Partnership, marriage areas are "weighty." Means you will have to face music. However, you will really be dancing to your own tune. New policy is put into effect. You are beneficiary. Message will be clarified.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Sense of humor is invaluable ally. This is especially applicable now-associate may make threat. Laugh rather than cry. Then you turn tables and apparent setback will boomerang in your favor.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Hopes, special desires are spotlighted. You get what you want, but not in manner expected. Older individual exerts influence. Be receptive without being weak. You are going to learn valuable lesson.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Stress practical approach. Take cash and let credit go. Be sure to obtain promises in writing. Then you avoid needless dispute. Build on solid base. Correct safety hazard which might exist at home.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you have natural sense of harmony. Your voice is unusual and you have real appreciation of music, the arts. You are entering cycle now that will be rich in opportunity. Be more independent, confident. By July, you will have feeling of fulfillment. Keep the faith.

IM V-Ball Champion To Be Known Soon

By GEOFF KURINSKY

UMass braves and squaws came out in large numbers this year to participate in the Intramural Volleyball tournaments. More than 220 teams entered the three events and 42 have qualified for playoff action in Men's, Women's, and Co-Rec groupings. Playoff matches will be going on all this week culminating with the championship finals on Thursday night.

The teams that have survived to qualify for the playoffs in the Men's action have come a long way--but must go a lot further if they have any hopes of making off with the title. In the Fraternity Division Sigma Alpha Epsilon is an odds on favorite to survive but Phi Mu Delta or Kappa Sigma could pull a surprise or two. The winner of the Frat division will meet the winner of the Residence Hall Division where the teams are pretty evenly matched. The winner of this contest will face the Independent champion for the campus championship. In the Independent grouping the Kamikazes have played brilliantly in five previous outings and look like the team to beat. They'll play the Ranches Monday night in the first round of the title route. The Kamikazes could be challenged by either the Hills South Assorted Nuts or the Racoons who also have the smell of victory before them. Men's action will be held at 6:15 on each of the four nights.

From the more than 40 teams entered in the Women's event, 14 have qualified for the playoffs. Women's matches are held immediately following the Men's at 7:15. Kappa Alpha Theta is the favorite in the Sorority bracket but Tri-Sig and Gss have also looked quite strong. The winner of the Sorority division will tap-off against the winner of the Residence Hall bracket for the Campus Championship. The teams with the best chances of representing the Residence Halls in the final are the Whalers or the Lovers.

Co-Rec action has proven most exciting since the matches began back in early February. The field has been narrowed down to 14 in this event where five guys and five gals are featured on each side of the net. The AC's look like they have the talent to go all the way to the title but they better look out for the Bim Bams who have looked strong and could present the AC's a stiff challenge. Another team that looked strong in earlier action was the Brett Black Bears. They could be considered the darkhorse of the event rallying around their stars Peter Brooks and MaryLou Londergan. At any rate, the results will be known after the final has been played on Thursday night.

The name of the game is volleyball but what it really is is excitement. If your studies are boring you or, whatever, come on down to the Boyden Main Gymnasium for some exciting volleyball action.

Colonels' ABA Title Worth "Small Change"

LOUISVILLE (AP)-There was champagne in the Kentucky Colonels' locker room after they clinched the Eastern Division title of the American Basketball Association but there was only a little enthusiasm for their achievement.

"Heck, this was worth only a few hundred bucks," said star forward Dan Issel after the Colonels whipped the Dallas Chaparrals 98-88 here Saturday night.

For winning the regular-season title, the Colonels will divide $5,000 among themselves. It will come to something less than $500 per share.

"We're saving the noise for the big one-the playoffs," Issel said.

Guard Louie Dampier said winning the title with a month to go in the season "is really rewarding. Now we've got to get ready for the playoffs."

The Colonels players said they still have some goals in the remaining weeks of the regular season.

For one thing, they want to keep their won-lost percentage higher than that of the Western Division leaders, the Utah Stars. Last year the Colonels lost the ABA title to Utah in a seven-game series in which the home team won every contest.

If the Colonels keep ahead of the Stars they would enjoy the home court advantage if the series went to a seventh game.

Issel added another incentive during the remaining games:

"We still must keep winning, first of all for our pride. The playoffs are a whole different season. It's good we've got a whole month to prepare for them."

McLain Set To Join A's

POMPANO BEACH, Fla. (AP)-Denny McLain left the Texas Rangers Sunday to join the Oakland A's, ready to work every fourth day on the mound and at the organ the other three if that's the way his new bosses want it.

McLain, his organ and the problems that go with them, went to the American League West champions Saturday in a trade in which the Rangers acquired only two minor league pitchers-Don Stanhouse and Jim Panther-for the one-time 31-game winner.

That fact, however, didn't disturb the unperturbable McLain. He couldn't have been happier, joking with A's owner Charles Finley in a telephone conversation about playing the organ and firing a parting shot at Ranger's manager Ted Williams.

"I'm delighted I'm going to have a chance to pitch again with a contender," McLain said. "Last year I realized how much I missed the Kalines and the Northrups," the stars of the teams when he was at Detroit. "Now I have the bandos and the Jacksons.

"I've talked to Mr. Finley. He welcomed me to the club and sounded enthusiastic. We've already talked about my playing the organ out there. He asked if I could play on the days I'm not pitching. He was joking-I think.

"I'm sure if they got me they're going to use me. I think Mr. Williams out there will hand me the ball more often than the Mr. Williams here."

That was a reference to the fact McLain expected A's manager Dick Williams to use him every fourth day as opposed to the five-day schedule the Rangers' Williams had him on.

McLain and Williams feuded about that the entire year, McLain insisting he should work every fourth day, Williams working him every fifth. That, said McLain earlier in the week, was one of the reasons for his 10-22 record last season.

"The disagreement with Williams had a lot to do with last year-a tremendous amount to do with it," McLain said. "I kept thinking He'd come around. But he didn't. I lost my desire to play after the All-Star break. I just didn't feel like trying to make a pitch.

"It was a totally embarrassing situation."

McLain has known those situations before.

A 31-game winner and most valuable player in 1968 with Detroit, McLain was suspended three times during the 1970 season-twice by Commissioner Bowie Kuhn and once by Tigers' General Manager Jim Campbell.

At the end of the season, he was traded to Washington in an eight-player transaction engineered by Senators' owner Bob Short. McLain has been grateful to Short for that ever since.

"I was a border-line basket-case at the time," McLain explained. "My nerves were going on me. I was an irritable SOB to be living with. Short gave me peace of mind when he traded for me-he probably saved my sanity."

While Short saved McLain's sanity he couldn't save his team. McLain was neither the winner nor the attendance draw Short expected and, with the club moved to Arlington, Tex., and words with Williams still being fired, McLain apparently had to go.

Wait 'til next year.

Leo Durocher said it. Dick Williams probably said it. Richard Nixon must have said it, too. And, no doubt, St. Anselm's Coach Frank Harrington said it after his team was beaten by a hustling Redmen six on Saturday afternoon by a score of 5-3.

Coach Harrington has much reason to be hopeful about the next season or two, since he'll lose only one player this year, and only two more after next year. So St. A's will definitely be a team to watch in the future.

But, this year, the more experienced UMass skaters overpowered the St. A's six to move the Redmen into the semi-finals for the ECAC Division II Championship. Playoff experience was a big factor in the game, considering the fact that St. Anselm's beat UMass about three weeks ago. But the Redmen were flying on Saturday.

The pattern of the game was set early in the first period when at 3:38 Joe O'Brien's stick caugh Pat Keenan in the left eye, sending the Redmen's leading scorer sprawling on the ice. Keenan had to leave for the rest of the period, and O'Brien went to the penalty box for 5:00 with a slashing penalty. This was only the second of the game's nineteen penalties.

At 10:52, Don Riley put the Redmen on the scoreboard with the first of his two goals. He made two good moves at half-ice, using the boards nicely to get around the defenseman, then fired a slap-shot, beating goalie Tom Gavin on his stick side. Riley played what was probably his best game of the season, and would have to be given top star of the contest. Linemate, Chico Shea was also in top form.

Less than two minutes later, Dan Reidy put the Redmen ahead 2-0, as he poked the puck past Gavin and an outstretched defenseman. Riley was the playmaker again at 17:27 when he dug the puck out of the corner, skated behind the St. Anselm's net and slid the puck out front, where Chico Shea tipped it in to make it 3-0. With only seconds left in the period, Riley had a partial breakaway, but Gavin came way out of his net to make the save, and caused a wild collision and pile-up as he tried to cover up on the loose puck. Tempers flared momentarily, as they continued to do so throughout the game.

P.J. Flaherty had to make only three stops in the first period as the Redmen dominated.

Hockey as a "contact sport" began to be emphasized greatly in the second period, as a few sticks were coming in contact with a few heads. First a St. A's player than a UMass player, skated off dripping blood, as tempers continued to boil. At 3:58 Al Nickerson made it 4-0 with a long slap-shot on which Gavin again came way out of his net, unnecessarily, only to have Nickerson's shot go between his pads.

Then the hitting and the penalties started to dominate the play. At 6:46 a hooking penalty to St. Anselm's Leo Shanahan; then, only six seconds later St. A's John Lindberg and Pat Keenan both went off for slashing, as they apparently couldn't wait to get at each other. Jack Edwards took an unbelievable check moments later, and he took a while to get back up. Coach Canniff had to do some quick shuffling of lines to compensate for the injured or penalized. Eight penalties were given in the last eight minutes of the period, as each team took turns at applying its power-play. But, neither was able to capitalize.

Early in the third period, it appeared as if Eric Scrafield had poked in the fifth goal, but the referees nullified the goal saying he had already blown his whistle. Finally, at 5:07, St. A's got on the scoreboard when Steve Daigle's shot ricocheted off the boards behind Flaherty, right on to the stick of the streaking Jim Morris, who fired it home. Twelve seconds later Bob Bartholomew was handed a ten-minute misconduct along with a two- minute slashing penalty. Add another ten seconds and St. A's quickly cut the score to 4-2 when Joe O'Brien tipped one in. St. Anselm's was hustling now and had the Redmen worried for awhile, but their momentum was broken as they collected three successive penalties beginning at 9:41. The Redmen couldn't penetrate Gavin during their long power-play, but at 18:53, Don Riley came through again, as he stole a clearing pass in the St. Anselm's zone and put the moves on Gavin for an unassisted goal.

Hoopsters Keep Tune To Road Blues

By EARLE BARROLL

BRONX, N.Y.--Rose Hill was as antiquated as the Cage and for some 30 minutes here Saturday night the UMass basketball team played with the magic of Curry Hicks...But the next three turned into a "road game" and N.I.T.-bound Fordham University built up enough of a cushion to hold off the Redmen in the last seven, 77-76.

The closeness of the score indicates what type of game it was: frustrating, but great. It was marred though by the inconsistencies of the men in striped shirts to a point where both coaches, Jack Leaman and Hal Wissel, termed one of the men a "zero."

Mike Pagliara had his greatest game as a Redman as he scored 27 points and handled the entire UMass floor show in a complete game performance. It was Pag himself who handled the vaunted Fordham press flawlessly by going between, under, over and anyway needed to get the ball up court.

But, this was not enough to offset the 41 points of Ken Charles, a Ram junior, who through the ineptitudes of his teammates to find the basket was called on to handle the bulk of the Fordham offense which he did with some to spare.

Pag's heroics were also not enough to counter the disaster of that three minute slump that brought Fordham back into the game and onward to a lead that the Redmen were unable to completely negate.

While Charles created the Fordham action himself, Pagliara had a couple of effective accomplices in Al Skinner and Charlie Peters.

Skinner was a picture of consistant fluidness throughout the evening as he battled the Rams to the tune of 15 rebounds down their end of the court and pitched in with 12 points down his own end, including three slitherine wheelings and dealings down the lane.

Peters was a more offensively minded center, helping out on breaking the press and setting up the offensive sets in the middle on offense. His board work was super, but three quick fouls, another loo-loo by the ref early in the second half and another great one later on sent him to the bench.

The first half was all UMass. With Fordham shooting only 33% the Redmen did not have to face the Ram press often and in the time being they ran with missed Fordham shots to hit on 51% of their own.

At 12-9 UMass, the Redmen went on a 12-4 burst on the strength of five points by Peters, jumpers by Betancourt and McLaughlin and a layup by Pagliara.

This was carried to the half where UMass led, 40-33, in their finest road half of the season and perhaps one of their finest halfs of the year at

In the second half, Fordham began to click offensively with some regularity and the Redmen were forced to contend with the press which caused some problems, turnovers and missed shots down their own end (36%).

Charles, after a 20 point first half, lay dormant for the opening minutes of this half while his teammates cut the lead to nothing with 12 minutes to go.

But the dormant one arose and ignited the spark in the Fordham attack that, in turn, fired up the Rose Hill clan into a complete zoo that caused UMass turnover after turnover, errant pass after errant pass...UMass had experienced the "road" for the first time in the game.

The lead built to 12 at 70-58, but in no time UMass snuck right back and forced Fordham to freeze the ball with just over two minutes to play and the Redmen down by five.

Charles and Tom Pipich (twice) missed one of their free throw attempts on one and ones and the gap closed to three as Pag hit a layup at the buzzer.

Fordham is 17-8 on their season, UMass is 14-11 including 5-10 on the road.

Frosh Lose Game, Undefeated Season At Brown

By FRANK ANTOSIEWICZ

Providence, Rhode Island--You win some, you lose some. Every streak has to end sometime, and that is what happened as the UMass freshman basketball team lost for the first time this season to a stronger and quicker Brown club, 115-100.

Hit 52% of your field goals, take more shots than the opposition, make six less turnovers and score 100 points. Throw that together, and the ingredients usually indicate an easy victory but in the strange case of Brown vs the UMass frosh, this was not the story.

In the first half, the running and gunning Brown Cubs ran up a lead which hit 14 at one point. With 5'10 guard Eddie Morris keying the fast break and 6'5 jumping jack Phil Brown grabbing the caroms, an offensive display reminiscent of the old Celtics, delighted a partisan crowd of 2000. The Cubs totally controlled the boards, outrebounding the Redmen 25-7 in the first half. They also hit a phenomenal 64% of their shots enroute to a 57-46 lead at the half. It was not that the Redmen played badly, but just that the Cubs shot so fantastically. John Murphy and Bill Endicott tried vainly to close the bag, but could not cope with the fine shooting Cubs. Bruce Guzowski, filling in for Tom Gillams who had 3 fouls and a sore ankle, also performed well in keeping the Brown frosh from making it a rout.

The second stanza began with the twisting and turning Somerville native, Bill Endicott, bringing the Redmen within five, before the elusive duo of Morris and Brown once again took a commanding lead of 12. Soon afterwards, within five seconds of each other, Gillams and Murphy fouled out of the game. The tandem of Guzowski and Dave Dibble, though they played well in relief, could not counter the aggressive, inspired play of the Cubs. The Brown varsity cheerleaders, in a style similar to Ike and Tina Turner, excited the crowd and Cubs to an unbeatable state of mind.

High scorers for the Brown frosh were two New Yorkers, Morris with 25 and Brown with 24. Leading the UMass attack was Endicott with 25 points, follwed by Murphy with 20 and Mike Flanagan with 19. Carom snatcher Phil Brown grabbed a game high total of 14 rebounds, while Murphy was high for UMass with 6. The Cubs drastically outrebounded the yearlings 51-28.

The Brown frosh outshot and outrebounded UMass in the first half, and then held on in next frame to put the game away from the charity stripe, as the dribblers were faced with a one and one foul situation with over ten minutes to go. The Cubs canned 31 free throws as compared to only 18 for the Redmen. The little Redmen finish the season with a 15-1 record, while the Brown Cubs are 16-2 with two games to go.

John Murphy set a new average/game scoring record, which was formerly held by Tim Edwards who averaged 20.1 p/g, enroute to canning 20 to cap the season averaging 20.8 p/g. The future is bright next year for the hoopsters, who were observed by future foe, Pennsylvania Coach Chuck Daley.

Emergency Committee Meets On Budget

By NATHAN GORENSTEIN

In their first meeting since the Student Strike of 1970 the Emergency Affairs Committee discussed last night what effect the Governor's proposed University budget will have if passed unchanged by the legislature.

The Committee was created to receive opinions on important matters from a broad spectrum of the University community. Its members are composed of faculty, students and administrators appropriate to the issue under discussion.

After introductory remarks by Acting-Chancellor Bromery, Vice-Chancellor for Academic Affairs, Robert Gluckstern, told the council what tye proposed budget meant and what affects it will have on the University.

Gluckstern said there is some hope that the budget cuts will be restored, notably money for new faculty, in the House and Senate Ways and Means Committee. If that does not materialize there would be two options open to the legislature on the matter of faculty. The funds for faculty positions could be restored, or the University could be given the faculty positions but not the necessary funds. He added, however, that the Governor could veto any decision.

That no new faculty positions were authorized for fiscal '73 marks the end of an informal understanding that has existed with the state government since the University started to expand in the late 1950's Gluckstern said. That was that as more students were enrolled the number of faculty would increase correspondingly to maintain a 15-1 student-faculty ratio. This, he said, was the basis for the University's major development.

An additional problem Gluckstern pointed out was that even if the budget cuts were restored in the legislature it would not come until June or later; too late to hire qualified faculty for the upcoming academic year. He said that at most 25 or so extra TA's could be positioned. With 864 students being added to the 1973 entering class this would do little to hold the 15-1 ratio at its present level.

One effort that could be made to make up some of the cut positions if the budget is not restored would be to make cuts in other areas of the University and use those funds to fill the 70 faculty positions now vacant on campus.

Faculty vacancies are created yearly by the legislature. It estimates how much unused salary will accumulate through the fiscal year and cuts the requested budget by that amount, (these cuts are called savings) while approving positions equal to the amount cut without funding. The University can then fill these extra positions if there is any money left in the faculty salary account at the end of the fiscal year. The faculty account, or category is termed 01.

This year the savings amounted to $1,200,000. Therefore, Gluckstern said, if the University budget is not restored, those 70 faculty positions could be filled with $800,000 taken from other University accounts.

If that must be done the funds will most likely come from the University's 03 account which covers such things as the summer school, student services and TA's. While a shift such as this requires legislative approval, Gluckstern said it probably would be possible to get. However, he emphasized that this was merely stripping one portion of the University bare to cover the other.

If the cuts in the 03 account must be made they would come in the summer school, the number of TA's hired for the next year and in money academic departments use for special programs.

Summer school funds would be cut from $900,000 to $400,000. This, according to Gluckstern, would limit summer school enrollment to swing shifters and seniors; allowing seniors to take only those basic courses needed to graduate. It would cut the graduate school back to offering only those courses that candidates for masters degrees would require.

The TA budget would be cut 4-5%, or $150,000. The schools and colleges in the University would loose a total of $150,000-$200,000 marked for special or innovative programs.

All these cuts would provide approximately $800,000, enough for the 70 faculty positions, but still below what is needed, Gluckstern said.

In other areas, the hearing budget was raised from $1,900,000 to $2,800,000 (It was figured wrong last year). Travel is the same, as is renovations and equipment. The printing budget was raised, operating supplies were dropped $120,000 from $1,000,000 and office supplies were raised $75,000 to cover telephone costs.

Gluckstern called the total budget, "standstill at best."

Job Prospects Looking Up

Employment prospects may be looking up--at least slightly--for this year's college students. But the outlook still is far from bright, even compared with last year when college recruiting activity dropped to its lowest point in a number of years.

The extent of this year's improvement varies with degree level according to the statistics furnished by the College Placement Council to which UMass belongs.

The mid-year report shows that activity at the bachelor's level is -71. Although accelerating somewhat over last year's figures, the volume remains less than one-third of what it was as recently as two years ago.

Perhaps the most significant finding in the current report is the rapid turnabout at the master's degree level. In January, volume was down 16% from a year ago. In this report, volume has jumped 28% ahead.

By curricula, at the bachelor's level accounting has attracted the most offers by far with a 53% increase over last March. Although both electrical and mechanical engineering are down about 18%, they are still next in volume, followed by business with approximately the same number of offers both years. The only discipline, other than accounting, with a substantial increase in volume is marketing and distribution, up 46% over a year ago. The humanities-social sciences category is at about the same level of activity as last March, while all of the engineering and science disciplines have drawn fewer offers than a year ago.

At the master's level, MBA candidates with a non-technical background continue to attract the most offers, followed by MBA's with a technical undergraduate degree and electrical and mechanical engineers, all up in volume from a year ago.

The tight nature of the job market continues to be reflected in the small increases in dollar value of offers. At the bachelor's level beginning salary offers over the two-year period since 1969-70 have gone up only 1%--3% in contrast to 5%--6% boosts recorded annually in the late '60s. (Business majors have experienced the largest gain in salary increases at 2.9% followed by civil engineers at 2.7%.)

Draft Counselor's Corner

Credit For Counseling Course

By GILBERT J. SALK

Although the draft is, at the moment, a minor threat to most people, it is far from being a dead issue. It is safe to assume that once the elections are over, the draft will return with increased vigor, and once your lives, and the lives of your brothers, will once again be fucked over by the war machine.

Many of you may escape immediate hassle by getting through on this year's lottery, but I hope that won't mean that you'll forget that there's still a war going on, that our brothers are being drafted and forced into kill-or-be killed situations, and that many others still have to face the draft which you've managed to escape.

You can ignore the situation, or you can make up your mind to spend some time and effort helping others find legal alternatives to the draft.

Starting tonight, there will be a 1-credit, pass-fail colloquium on the draft. It will meet for four consecutive Tuesday evenings from 7-10 p.m., in the Cance Lounge in Southwest. There is a distinct need for people who are informed about how the SSS works, and what can be done about it, in order to counteract the myths, rumors and misinformation currently circulating. If you are willing to help, I'd urge you to take this course, both for your own information and to possibly become a draft counselor.

Needless to say, the course will be offered to both men and women (women do make fine counselors) and it can be taken without credit if you prefer. If you want credit for the course, you should get an ADD card at either the registrar's office or from Wally Silva in Southwest (phone 545-2803). Get the needed signatures and bring the card with you tonight.

There is a $5.00 charge for books and other literature, which is negotiable if you're short on bread, AND for all my fans out there in Collegianland, I'll be teaching the course, so here's a wonderful chance to see if I really exist in real life. (No eggs, please.)

Potential draftees need your help, so please try to take the course. The draft you end may save your neck.

Peace.

McCarthy Students Seem Indifferent Over Primary

DURHAM, N.H. (AP) — While the nation's eyes focus on New Hampshire for Tuesday's presidential primary, students-a potent force in the campaign of Sen. Eugene McCarthy in 1968-seem almost indifferent.

Sue Roman, coordinator for the campaign of Sen. George S. McGovern, D-S.D., on the 9,300-student University of New Hampshire campus, says a frequent comment she hears is, "I don't care who's elected."

The so-called "Children's Crusade" of 1968 is credited with much of the push which garnered a large block of the Democratic primary vote for McCarthy. Shortly afterward Lyndon B. Johnson decided not to seek another term as president.

But the stridency of 1968 apparently is gone.

"I would guess that 50 per cent of the students are still undecided about who they're going to vote for," Miss Roman said. "Some of it I can understand; the students are busy studying."

She said that when she began working for McGovern she was told "to shoot for 4,000 votes out of the campus for McGovern. Now I think we'll be lucky to get 4,000 votes out of the campus-period."

Her assessment was upheld by political science instructor Bob Craig, who said that "probably only a fraction of one per cent of the students are actively involved in the primary."

Craig, a supporter of Sen. Edmund S. Muski, D-Maine, added, however, that "the ones who are involved are as dedicated as any that can be found anywhere."

Campaign activities tend toward the traditional-canvassing of dormitories and downtown homes, urging citizens to register and vote.

Administration Calls Bangladesh 'A Reality'

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Nixon administration conceded Monday that Bangladesh is "a reality," but said political considerations must be weighed before extending diplomatic recognition to the war-torn Asian nation.

Christopher Van Hollen, deputy assistant secretary of state, urged the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to delay action on resolutions calling for recognition of Bangladesh, formerly East Pakistan.

Recognition of the new government, which declared its independence following the two-week India-Pakistan war last December, is only one element of an overall tudy to develop "a new set of relationships" with the Asian subcontinent, Van Hollen said.

Sen. Frank Church, D-Idaho, presiding at the hearing, declared that 47 nations have now recognized Bangladesh and "I should have thought we would have been the first."

A Sample Of What May Come To Pass

BULLETIN: DIXVILLE NOTCH, N.H. (AP) — President Nixon took all 11 Republican votes cast at the tiny resort community of Dixville Notch, leading off the first balloting in the 1972 presidential campaign.

The six Democratic voters went: 5 for Sen. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine and one for Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota.

No Maiden Name On Drivers License Says Supreme Court

WASHINGTON (AP) — In a unanimous ruling, the Supreme Court today held that married women do not have a right to be issued drivers' licenses in their maiden name.

Without elaboration, the court agreed with a panel of federal judges in Alabama who tossed out a suit brought by an Anniston woman and agreed with state officials that married names should be used for identification purposes.

The woman, Wendy Forbush, had an agreement with her husband, Ronald P. Carver, whom she married in 1970, that she would use her maiden name in personal and business dealings.

GOVERNOR SARGENT HERE TODAY AT THE SUB, 8:00 P.M.

Gov. Sargent Here Tonight

Governor Francis W. Sargent will address the UMass community tonight in the Student Union Ballroom at 8:00 p.m.

The Governor will speak on "environmental policy."

Francis W. Sargent was first elected Lt. Governor of the Commonwealth in 1966 as the running mate of John Volpe. When Volpe went to Washington to serve in President Nixon's cabinet as secretary of transportation, Sargent took over as Governor in 1969. In 1970, Sargent defeated Kevin White of Boston for Governor in the Massachusetts general election. Before being elected Lt. Governor, Sargent served as Commissioner of Massachusetts Department of Public Works.

Governor Sargent has received honorary degrees from Southeastern Massachusetts University, and Framingham State College. He graduated from Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1939, receiving a special degree in architecture.

The Governor has received the Annual Award from the National Wildlife Association, the Annual Award for a beautiful America (Holiday Magazine), the Annual Award from the Trustees of Reservations, the Annual Award from the New England Outdoor Writers, and the Award from the Boston College symposium 0on Conservation and Recreation.

Governor Sargent's speech is being sponsored by the Campus Center Program Council and CEQ.

Illinois Fireworks Plant Suffers Fromm Explosions

ORLAND PARK, Ill. (AP) - A series of explosions leveled a two-mile-square fireworks manufacturing complex Monday, killing three persons, blowing out windows and cracking walls up to 12 miles away on Chicago's South Side.

Firemen from a dozen communities took several hours to control the fires ignited by the midafternoon explosions at Melrose Display Fireworks Co. At one point police, fearful of more explosions, evacuated homes and offices within a two-mile radius of the complex and barricaded roads within a five-mile radius.

Fourteen persons, including two policemen involved in early rescue attempts, were listed as injured, none seriously. A full work force estimated at about 100, was on duty at Melrose when the blasts began.

State police said three bodies were found in a search of the complex and adjoining fields. Sheriff's office police said two persons were known to be missing.

Authorities could give no cause for the explosions, or even the number, although some persons at the scene said they heard 12 blasts.

The explosions left only two of the complex's 14 one-story concrete-block buildings standing. Some of the storage structures, all with wood roofs, were said to have contained dynamite, but it was not known if they exploded.

As darkness fell, fire-fighters linked their trucks in a pumping brigade to extinguish brush fires in the open area around the wrecked plant, 25 miles south of downtown Chicago.

SOS Accepts Compromise Motion

By MDC STAFF

Students Offering Support (S.O.S.) voted last evening to accept a compromise motion which proposes that the Student Senate fund both the Concert Committee and S.O.S.

The motion asks that the Senate appropriate $6,000 to the Concert Committee to enable them to provide for a Spring Concert and to provide $2,000 to S.O.S. for organizational expenses. The motion also made clear the fact that the Spring Concert would be a benefit with funds collected going to S.O.S. to pay for legal expenses of the 28 parents who have brought suit against the State Dept. of Mental Health for negligence at Belchertown State Hospital.

The motion accepted by S.O.S. reads as follows: to provide $6,000 for the Concerts; $2,000 to S.O.S. for organizational purposes but not for legal fees; the free concert would still be a benefit for S.O.S. and the contributions derived from the Concert could be used for legal fees.

S.O.S. Chairman Joe Sylvia told the Collegian that he feels the compromise accepted by S.O.S. should be acceptable to all of the students at UMass. Sylvia said that since there seems to be a group of students who have expressed a sincere interest in having a concert it is not his intention to prevent them from having one. He feels that abandoning the idea of a concert would perhaps alienate some students.

S.O.S. had originally asked the Student Senate last Wednesday to transfer the entire Concert Committee account to their group. But it was brought out that this would be impossible because of the legal issues involved.

Student Senate Vice President Lawrence R. Ladd, present at last night's meeting, reported that there is a legal question of using student funds to finance a court suit. Ladd, who met with Student Senate Attorney Richard Howland to determine the legality of the motion to transfer the entire $8,112, reported that if the motion were passed, the University could refuse to sign the check over to S.O.S.

The new motion asking for $2,000 for organizational expenses for S.O.S. would be legal according to Ladd. Also money collected at the Concert could legally be used to pay for legal fees in the case.

At last night's meeting, Chairman Sylvia reported that by holding a benefit concert to aid the mentally retarded at Belchertown, the Concert Committee could receive a very good reaction from the faculty at the University and from residents of the Amherst area.

Starting today and continuing up to the time of Wednesday night's Senate meeting, members of S.O.S. will be circulating petitions at Dining Commons, the Student Union and at a table in the Campus Center seeking student support for the new motion drawn up at last evening's meeting. It is hoped that 6,000 names will be collected to present to the Senate at their meeting on Wednesday night.

WMPIRG Petitioning Reaches 50%

An official spokesman for WMPIRG, the Western Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group, announced last night that the group has now received signatures from over 50% of the student body in their drive to create a special, refundable tax to fund WMPIRG. Petitioning will continue this week in order to gain a larger percentage of signatures.

The actual amount of 8,500 (out of 16,000 plus undergraduates) was collected last Friday night but WMPIRG decided to hold off announcement until they had been checked over, counted and locked up. Asked how much longer petitioning will go on, the spokesman said, "At least another week. What we want is to collect another 2,000 names so that we will have a good solid majority of students backing us when we go before the Trustees."

The WMPIRG petition is an endorsement of a two-dollar per student per semester refundable fee to be added to each students' next semester. The money will go to hire a full-time staff of public interest professionals--lawyers, scientists, economists, etc., and to fund WMPIRG's projects. The money will be refunded the third week into every semester to those not wishing to support the group.

UMass joins four other Western Massachusetts student bodies that have already endorsed the WMPIRG funding procedure. A majority of signatures have been gathered at Greenfield C.C., Hampshire College, Our Lady of the Elms in Springfield and Northampton Junior College. "There are about another 12 schools that are now running petition drives but haven't yet reached 50%" the spokesman stated. In the Five-College area all the schools but Smith seem to be going well and should be finished by the middle of March. "Smith is having its own problems with its administration and their Student Senate which is trying to abolish itself."

Wednesday, WMPIRG comes before the Student Senate to ask for its endorsement and approval of the funding plan. The proposed bill supporting the Western Mass PIRG promises to spark some lively debate. Validation of the petitions will be done by the Student Senate Governmental Affairs Committee before Wednesday night.

Asked what will happen now, the spokesman said, "Well we have the student support and that's what's essential. Now we have to rally support from other areas-faculty, the administration, and the legislature. Once we have all our supporters behind us, we will present the idea to the Trustees. After that, we'll have some campus-wide elections and start to work doing projects and hiring the staff."

Senior Day Barbecue Date Set

By MARY GOODYEAR

The Senior Day Committee, at a meeting last night, tentatively decided to hold the Senior Day barbecue set for May 26 in the central area of the quad.

The aim of the committee is to use the quad area, but not the dorms. Tight security will have to be maintained to keep students out of area dorms. In case of rain a room of Worcester dining commons will be set aside for senior use. Even though these alternate plans will be made, Art Warren, assistant director of food services, said at the meeting, "don't let it rain, it would be a real fiasco."

A major problem of the committee that went unsolved at the meeting concerned the number of guests that each senior can bring. Jill Corcoran, the advisor to student affairs, brought up the point that "the basic reason permission was granted for this event was that it is to be for graduating seniors and not an open party." The stipulations made by the board of trustees were that someone over 21 must take the responsibility for any underage guests and that it must be a closed party.

Other areas discussed, but about which no definite decisions were made, include the menu and ticket sales.

Intent Of ITT Memo Disputed

WASHINGTON (AP) — A physician testified Monday that Mrs. Dita D. Beard was under severe, periodic mental stress at the time she prepared a memo involved in accusations against the International Telephone and Telegraph Corp. and officials of the Justice Department.

Mrs. Beard, a lobbyist for IT&T, is in a Denver hospital.

The IT&T controversy has delayed Senate action on the appointment of Richard G. Kleindienst to succeed John N. Mitchell as attorney general.

Mrs. Beard's doctor, Dr. Victor L. Liszka, a heart surgeon of Arlington, Va., said that she denied to him that she meant to imply any connection in the memo between an antitrust suit against IT&T and an IT&T pledge of $400,000 to the Republican National Convention.

In testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Liszka said he has been treating Mrs. Beard for what he described as a serious heart ailment. He said she frequently combined alcohol with tranquilizers to overcome mental depressions brought on by her heart trouble.

The memo, which Liszka said Mrs. Beard acknowledged as being hers, was written to her boss and later was published by columnist Jack Anderson.

Kleindienst, deputy attorney general under Mitchell, won unanimous Senate Judiciary Committee endorsement before Anderson's allegations were published last week. He has been acting attorney general since Mitchell stepped down last Wednesday to take charge of President Nixon's re-election campaign.

At Monday's hearing a statement from Solicitor General Erwin Griswold was read, describing a meeting Griswold had with then antitrust chief Richard L. McLaren and Kleindienst in the Justice Department last April 18 or 19.

Griswold said in the statement, requested by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., that he was summoned to Kleindienst's office and asked how far along was legal action in an antitrust action involving IT&T and its subsidiary Grinnell Corp.

Griswold said he told Kleindienst a 10-day extension of plans to file a court suit was possible if good reasons could be shown.

52 Injured In Belfast Bombing

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) — Fifty-two persons, most of them women, were injured Monday by a bomb that exploded behind a big movie theater and rocked central Belfast. Minutes later, another blast wrecked a Londonderry hotel.

The Belfast explosion panicked a matinee audience at the Ritz Cinema. People ran out screaming. Ambulances took the injured to hospitals.

Only a few of the moviegoers were hurt when the bomb went off outside a hijacked truck. Most of the injured were shoppers and office girls bloodied by shattered windows and suffering from shock.

The blast smashed windows in the Europe Hotel, Belfast's newest and biggest, and other downtown buildings up to 300 yards away.

The terrorist attack came despite pleas for peace after two girls were killed and 136 persons injured Saturday in the bombing of a crowded Belfast restaurant.

The four-story Ardowen Hotel in Londonderry, Ulster's second city, was wrecked by a bomb but no one was reported hurt.

Three masked gunmen planted the bomb and gave the staff 25 minutes to leave. There were no guests in the hotel at the time.

Meanwhile, 29 victims of Saturday's attack on the Abercorn Restaurant remained in hospitals. Seven were reported "very seriously ill."

Police said a vague telephone warning only 60 seconds before the bombing was traced to a bar in the Roman Catholic Lower Falls district. The area is a stronghold of the outlawed Irish Republican Army.

The IRA, which is fighting a guerrilla war to wrest Ulster from Britain and unite it with Ireland, disclaimed responsibility for the bombing and blamed the attack on Protestant extremists.

In Enniskillen, fiery protester Bernadette Devlin was cheered and carried shoulder high by a crowd chanting "IRA forever" after she and other militants won postponement of a court hearing on charges of staging an outlawed parade.

The tiny, 24-year-old member of the British Parliament, who was sentenced to six months in jail last month in a similar case, was accused with more than 70 other persons of marching Feb. 13 to protest the internment without trail of IRA suspects. She pleaded innocent.

High Court Rules On 'Secret Tag' Status

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court Monday agreed to rule on the scope of the government's authority to put a secret tag on documents and keep them from Congress and the public.

The test case concerns nine reports and letters prepared for President Nixon in advance of an underground nuclear test in Alaska.

The federal appeals court here has ruled that an entire file cannot be classified and kept secret simply because some of the material in it is sensitive.

The Justice Department objected, saying this kind of judgment belongs exclusively to the executive branch of government. The dispute will be argued next winter and a decision reached by June 1973.

The file was assembled for Nixon by a committee headed by Undersecretary of State John N. Irwin. It contained reports on potential consequences to the environment, national defense and foreign relations of the test known as Cannikin and conducted last November on Amchitka Island.

When word leaked out that some government officials disapproved, 33 members of Congress headed by Rep. Patsy T. Mink, D-Hawaii, sued for release of portions of the file.

Meanwhile, the high court acted to speed up consideration of attempts by a grand jury to question assistants of Sen. Mike Gravel, D-Alaska, about publication of the Pentagon Papers. This case also would have been heard next term, but Solicitor General Erwin N. Griswold sought and won promise of a ruling before the end of June.

Griswold told the court that not only was the grand jury in Boston slowed down but that the government might be deprived of important evidence needed for the prosecution of Daniel Ellsberg and Anthony J. Russo. They go on trial in Los Angeles May 9 charged with theft of the once-secret study of the Vietnam war.

New Operations Near DMZ Opened By S. Vietnamese

SAIGON (AP) — South Vietnamese forces have opened new operations near the demilitarized zone and the old imperial capital of Hue, field sources said Monday.

Fighting increased in neighboring Laos, where informants said government forces were in "full retreat" after a heavy North Vietnamese counter-attack on the Plain of Jars.

Cambodia's high command reported a sharp clash on an island in the Mekong River with heavy casualties on both sides.

The South Vietnamese field reports said about 1,500 men of the Saigon government's 1st Division began a sweeping operation Sunday west of Hue.

A second operation disclosed by the sources involved 1,500 soldiers from the South Vietnamese 3rd Division on a sweep just south and west of Quang Tri City. It began last Friday. Quang Tri is just below the demilitarized zone that divides the two Vietnams.

Officers in the field said both operations were designed to "sweep old enemy base areas to see if they still are being used."

Little or no contact has been reported in either drive, the sources said.

In Brief...

Job Discrimination Bill Passed

WASHINGTON (AP)—The Senate Monday passed 62-10 the compromise bill giving enforcement powers for the first time the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission-EEOC-to move against job discrimination.

WASHINGTON (AP)—In a unanimous ruling, the Supreme Court today held that married women do not have a right to be issued drivers' licenses in their maiden name.

Without elaboration, the court agreed with a panel of federal judges in Alabama who tossed out a suit brought by an Anniston woman and agreed with state officials that married names should be used for identification purposes.

College Freshman Wins Election

ARLINGTON, Mass. (AP) — Charles H. Lyons, an 18-year-old freshman at Boston State College, has been elected a school committee member and town meeting member in his first bid for office.

Parochial Aid Unconstitutional

BURLINGTON, Vt. (AP) — A panel of U.S. District Court judges ruled today that Vermont's year-old parochial aid law is unconstitutional and issued a permanent injunction against its implementation.

Harvard Protests

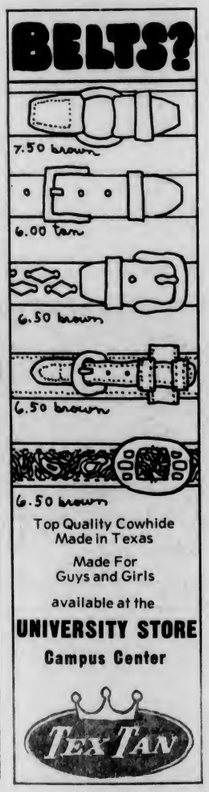
CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — Five hundred black crosses were placed in the snow in Harvard Yard Monday to protest Harvard University's ownership of Gulf Oil Co. stock.

Members of the Pan-African Liberation Committee and the Harvard Radcliffe Association of African and Afro- American Students said the crosses represented blacks who died "at the hands of the Portuguese" in Angola, Mozambique and Guinea-Bisseau during the last two years.

Commission Reports On State Funding Of Schools

WASHINGTON (AP) — State governments should assume the major burden of financing public education, reducing reliance on the local property tax, a presidential commission recommended Monday after a two-year study.

President Nixon's Commission on School Finance said the federal government should help speed the process by providing incentives to state governments to help them switch over to state-financed education within five years.



But the federal role in financing education should only be supplementary, the 18-member commission said. It was a recommendation that runs counter to those of many private educational groups which have urged an increasing federal role.

The commission said incentives to smooth the path to greater state-financed education could be set up in several ways, with the cost to the federal government estimated at $4 billion to $5 billion over five years of transition.

As the report was released, Nixon held a 75-minute meeting on school busing with his Cabinet committee. A spokesman said the President will be holding more meetings before making his position known on the busing issue. No statement is likely before Tuesday, he said.

The school-financing panel urged an additional outlay of $1 billion a year to help inner-city schools through a federal matching program.

N.H. Primary Today

MANCHESTER, N.H. (AP)-While New Hampshire voters prepared to cast the first presidential primary ballots in 1972, Sen. George McGovern accused Sen. Edmund S. Muskie Monday of desperation tactics in a dispute over disclosure of campaign finances.

Muskie countered that it was he, not McGovern, who made the first financial disclosures and "I'm the one he has chosen to attack."

Muskie, the front-running favorite, and McGovern are the leading entries in a New Hampshire field of five on-the-ballot candidates and one write-in campaigner for Tuesday's Democratic primary. On the Republican side, President Nixon is expected to defeat easily his two challengers.

Voting hours vary, with the polls closing as late as 8 p.m. EST.

In some New Hampshire hamlets, voters gather at midnight to cast the first tricle of ballots of the presidential year.

Estimates of the Democratic turnout range from 60,000 to 70,000 votes in a contest that has overshadowed the Republican presidential preference primary.

In that one, the polls indicate Nixon holds a massive lead over two challengers, Reps. Paul N. McCloskey of California and John M. Ashbrook of Ohio.

The other Democratic entries are Sen. Vance Hartke of Indiana; Mayor Sam Yorty of Los Angeles; Edward T. Coll, a social worker from Hartford, Conn., and Rep. Wilbur D. Mills of Arkansas, a write-in candidate.

Senator Muskie ended his campaign in Berlin, across the border from his native Rumford, Maine, seeks a landslide New England sendoff for his primary campaigns across the nation.

He has avoided setting any percentage goal in New Hampshire. "I don't make predictions," he said Monday.

McGovern has said a 25 per cent share of the vote would be a respectable showing for him.

In separate balloting, New Hampshire voters will award the 18 nominating votes at the Democratic National Convention, 14 at the Republican convention. Muskie and Nixon are expected to sweep the delegate contests.

The campaign finance controversy flared after Democratic candidates met Sunday night in televised debate, with McGovern contending that only he had disclosed his sources of income. Muskie replied that he filed reports in 1970 but stopped because nobody else did so.

Boyd Says Hoover Ended Berrigan Plot

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP)-J. Edgar Hoover's disclosure of an alleged antiwar conspiracy by a militant group of Roman Catholics brought an end to plans by the Rev. Philip Berrigan and six others to kidnap presidential adviser Henry Kissinger, FBI informant Boyd Douglas testified Monday. He said a plot to blow up Washington heating tunnels also collapsed.

Douglas, 31, also said, as he wound up a week of testimony under direct examination, that in the aftermath of Hoover's Nov. 27, 1970, statement he was accused by defendant Elizabeth McAlister, a Catholic nun, of leading information to the FBI director.

He told the jury of nine women and three men trying Berrigan and the six others on federal antiwar conspiracy charges, that Sister McAlister "also told me as far as the kidnapping of Kissinger was concerned, that only the inner circle knew about the kidnapping; that she could count the number of persons on her hands."

"You were a member of the inner circle?" asked U.S. District Court Judge R. Dixon Herman.

"Yes," said Douglas, who served as a courier for Berrigan when both were inmates at Lewisburg Penitentiary and, when discovered, became an informer for the FBI.

Leading House Rep Resigns

WASHINGTON (AP)-Rep. William Colmer said Monday he would not seek re-election, opening the way for the House Democratic leadership to establish a tighter grip on the important House Rules Committee.

Colmer, 82, a Mississippi Democrat, now heads the mercurial committee and leads a conservative coalition which, from time to time, has dominated the 15-man panel and frustrated legislative plans for the liberal leadership.

Although its makeup is 10 Democrats and five Republicans, Colmer and two other Democrats occasionally combine with the five Republicans to give the conservatives an 8-7 voting edge.

If tradition were followed, Rep. Ray J. Madden, 80, a liberal from Indiana, would succeed Colmer in the chairmanship of the committee which plays a large role in a determining what legislation reaches the House floor.

And the leadership would be in a position to back another liberal as Colmer's numerical replacement, thus minimizing the possibility of a conservative coalition prevailing on key votes.

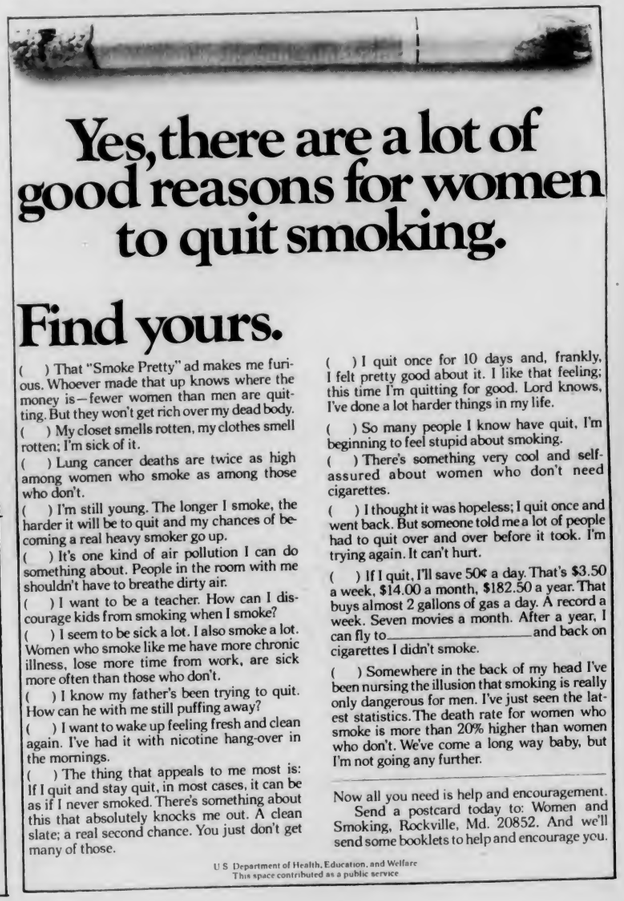
The committee currently is holding up clearance of a minimum-wage-increase bill on which the leadership wants to let the House vote.

Only last month, over Democratic leaders' opposition, it sent to the House floor a bill to halt the dock strike.

Colmer has been the committee's conservative leader since January 1967, when he succeeded Howard W. Smith, D-Va., as chairman.

Draft Call Set At 15,000

WASHINGTON (AP)-Issuing the first draft call in five months, Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird announced Monday that 15,000 men will be drafted into the Army during April, May and June.



The call was the first since October when the Pentagon closed out 1971 with a 10,000-man quota spread over the final three months of the year.

No draft calls were issued during the first quarter of 1972 as Pentagon officials waited to determine whether more than $3 billion in new military pay increases generated enough volunteers to fill its manpower needs. Another factor was a congressional order to trim 70,000 men from the Army by June 30.

The administration is trying to achieve an all-volunteer force by mid-1973. The Army exceeded slightly its 15,000-man enlistment goal for January but fell short by more than 3,000 in February.

"We're making progress," Laird told the winter meeting of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. He said the draft was 300,000 in 1969, the year he took office; 200,000 in 1970, 38,000 last year, "and this year we will reduce those calls to 50,000 or less."

This will enable the Nixon administration to fill its military needs in an election year with the smallest draft since before the Korean War. The last time draft calls fell below 50,000 was in 1949 when 9,781 men were inducted.

( ) Lung cancer deaths are twice as high among women who smoke as among those who don't.

( ) I'm still young. The longer I smoke, the harder it will be to quit and my chances of becoming a real heavy smoker go up.

( ) It's one kind of air pollution I can do something about. People in the room with me shouldn't have to breathe dirty air.

( ) I want to be a teacher. How can I discourage kids from smoking when I smoke?

( ) I seem to be sick a lot. I also smoke a lot. Women who smoke like me have more chronic illness, lose more time from work, are sick more often than those who don't.

( ) I know my father's been trying to quit. How can he with me still puffing away?

( ) I want to wake up feeling fresh and clean again. I've had it with nicotine hang-over in the mornings.

( ) The thing that appeals to me most is: If I quit and stay quit, in most cases, it can be as if I never smoked. There's something about this that absolutely knocks me out. A clean slate; a real second chance. You just don't get many of those.

( ) I quit once for 10 days and, frankly, I felt pretty good about it. I like that feeling; this time I'm quitting for good. Lord knows, I've done a lot harder things in my life.

( ) So many people I know have quit, I'm beginning to feel stupid about smoking.

( ) There's something very cool and self-assured about women who don't need cigarettes.

( ) I thought it was hopeless; I quit once and went back. But someone told me a lot of people had to quit over and over before it took. I'm trying again. It can't hurt.

( ) If I quit, I'll save 50¢ a day. That's $3.50 a week, $14.00 a month, $182.50 a year. That buys almost 2 gallons of gas a day. A record a week. Seven movies a month. After a year, I can fly to _____ and back on cigarettes I didn't smoke.

( ) Somewhere in the back of my head I've been nursing the illusion that smoking is really only dangerous for men. I've just seen the latest statistics. The death rate for women who smoke is more than 20% higher than women who don't. We've come a long way baby, but I'm not going any further.

Now all you need is help and encouragement.

Send a postcard today to: Women and Smoking, Rockville, Md. 20852. And we'll send some booklets to help and encourage you.

Part Of Your Character

There are many animals that make up this world, and one of the lowest animals is the individual who deals in termpapers. He is the pimp of the printed page, the pusher of illicit goods. He is like the sharpy who gives young girls from the slums a few of the luxuries they don't have in return for the dignity and self-respect they sacrifice at the feet of well-heeled patrons who can afford the $50-a-shot price tag. A middleman who provides a market for those who produce and those who demand, he is unconcerned with the society his actions undermine or the people he feeds off. Satisfaction is his pockets filled with money.

According to an article in the Collegian (3/2/72), one of these animals is cultivating his garden right in the university's backyard. From the exclusive Amherst Carriage Inn, a UMass graduate student is heading Termpapers of Amherst, an organization which is linked to the major termpaper companies in the Boston area. The company buys papers at about $1 per page and sells them for $2 a page, a 100% profit for the operators. Deans from surrounding colleges have spoken out against this operation, but I would like to know what is being done to stamp out this company for the dangers of a termpaper service are obvious.

Even though a grade for a termpaper is never the sole determining factor of a semester grade, it can make a great deal of difference in borderline cases. If we accept that success in college is determined by one's grades, then the wealthier student will have a much better chance of being successful than the poorer student. This additional chance at success rests solely on the student's financial resources and not on his intellectual resources.

Further, individuals who run this type of operation are like contagious diseases. If they are not treated immediately they spread their sickness to other areas of the society. The successful sale of termpapers could lead to an expansion of services. Take-home finals could be produced, students could be hired to take examinations, and the entire integrity and credibility of the academic world would be lost.

I feel that this integrity and credibility should be preserved. Since university officials will probably be handcuffed in their attempts to eradicate Termpapers of Amherst, its ultimate success or failure rests solely with the students of the university community. We can preserve the integrity of the academic system by asserting our personal integrity and refusing to prostitute ourselves in support of a leech who is eager to suck his sustenance from the needs of students. The price you pay for a termpaper is much more than $2 per page: it costs you part of your character.

Who's In Charge?

We would like to say that apparently Governor Francis Sargent will be allowing a question and answer period after his speech in the Student Union Ballroom tonight at 7:30.

Originally Sargent was only going to deliver his speech and leave, according to his office aides. Now that he will be staying a little longer, we hope that all the students here will turn out and press Sargent on all the issues which have arisen since he was invited here to speak on environment.

We do not particularly feel that cutting the UMass and Belchertown budgets are any way to legitimately balance the state budget. After all, is sacrificimg humane treatment for the mentally retarded and destroying quality higher education for all state colleges and UMass really where the priorities should lie?

Is it really fair of the governor to propose a new tuition hike which won't necessarily be used for higher education? Is a 20% cut in the UMass budget really result in substantial savings for the taxpayer of the Commonwealth?

These are just some of the questions to which we hope Sargent will also address himself. Yes, everybody wants a safe environment, but many politicians have just started to use that because it sounds good.

Is It Worth Two Bucks?

By JACK KOCH

Last Tuesday night the Student Senate Budget Committee, after brief discussion, voted to fund next year's INDEX one dollar. Since this action not only means no yearbook for the class of 1973, but also the setting of a precedent for the future yearbooks at UMass, I hope to present as unbiased a view of the INDEX budget proposals as possible.

On February 9th, when the Student Senate authorized INDEX to present a 1972-3 budget, it was with the understanding that the 1973 yearbook would be considerably different. They retained the option that if it were not, the budget could be reduced to $1.

INDEX presented two budgets, one for the traditional type yearbook and one for a paperbound, as mentioned at the Student Senate. This was to allow the Senate to determine the format of the book.

If the committee had opted for the hardbound version, it would have been a 320 page black and white book printing 13,000 copies. This meant appropriating $49,560.00 from the Student Activities Tax Fund, about 18% savings from the current SATF of $600,565.00 ($3.83 per student).

Had the committee opted for the paperbound version, it would have consisted of three volumes; the first two of 100 pages each for all students that paid the tax. Volume three would be the senior section of 120 pages and would be in magazine format in black and white, resulting in a savings in printing, distribution, and cover. The cost would be $34,060.00 from the SATF, a savings of 44% over the current appropriation. An optional slip case was presented with this budget which would increase the cost $15,500.00. Although it is easier to keep three magazine type books together in a slip case, it was not mandatory.

At the very minimum, the 1973 yearbook would be transformed from a hardbound to paperback, from some color to none, from 384 pages to 320 pages, from a senior section for all to one for seniors only, and a 44% reduction in SATF.

The charge that the book is not different is reduced to one of nearsighted perception.

Provided that there is no change in the SATF rate next year, the INDEX would cost each student less than $2. Think of what you now get for your $35.50 tax: Collegian, Spectrum, Yahoo, and possibly Drum. There is still time to notify your Senator (if you know who he is) to speak for or against a 1973 yearbook. Is an INDEX worth $2 to you?

Nixon And The Electronic Battlefield

By DOUGLAS HANSON

"War is no longer the desperate annihilating struggle that it was. It is a warfare of limited aims. This is not to say that...the conduct of war...has become less bloodthirsty or more chivalrous. On the contrary...But in a physical sense war involves very small numbers of people, mostly highly trained specialists. The fighting takes place on the vague frontiers whose whereabouts the average man can only guess at..." George Orwell, 1984

Under increased troop withdrawals from IndoChina and reducing the casualties to a politically "tolerable" level, Nixon has increased bombing with no noticeable reaction from the American people still set on pursuing a military victory in IndoChina. While still not fully realizing the potential of the ELECTRONIC BATTLEFIELD, Nixon has replaced the human element with the machine or the Electronic Battlefield for the troops. As Gen. Westmoreland puts it "We are making unusual efforts to avoid having the American young man stand eyeball to eyeball, toe to toe even rifle to rifle with the enemy."

Since Nixon took office over 2,700,000 tons of bombs have been dropped on IndoChina, more than were dropped on two continents during World War II and the Korean war combined. The U.S. has dropped 300 pounds for every man, woman and child in IndoChina or has dropped 22 tons for every square mile of land.

The Electronic Systems Divisions at Hanscom Field has combined space-age technology, not far from Orwell's war, for destroying human beings. "Igloo White", code name for the automated destruction of supply routes currently being used on the Ho Chi Minh trail, is a product of this technology gone wild. Supporters boast that it is "entirely air supported-it requires no troops". It is comprised of battery operated sesmic sensors, SPIKEBUOY, ADSID, and acoustic sensors, ACOUBUOY, ACOUSID, which are either imbedded into the ground as the sesmic sensors are or hung in trees like the acoustic sensors. Acoustic sensors transmit noise in the vicinity, while the sesmic sensors transmit only ground vibrations. Sesmic sensors like the ADSID are more commonly used because they need less energy to transmit a simple beep for vibrations than the acoustic sensors need to transmit sound. These transmissions are relayed through circling drone planes, which are unmanned, to two IBM 360-65 computers situated far from danger in Nakhon Phanom, Thailand. The computers analyze the information, printing out the data by time and place. A display map is projected for the section under suspicion and shows the movement by a moving blip commonly called "the worm". The computer printout is relayed to an intelligence coordinator, ISC, or to the Battlefield Control Center, which sets up the attack. Everything is automated including flying the plane, the fighter pilot receives coded-coordinates which he punches into his on-board computer and sits back, bombs are released automatically, finishing what he calls "the most boring of all combat missions." A feature of Igloo White is that it can't distinguish between a truck and a cart, friend or foe, civilian or soldier, adult or child or man or animal and with cold precision programs destruction for whatever crosses its path. Over two billion dollars have been spent on Igloo White in the last 5 years. "Air Force officials consider the program to be successful and envision a world-wide deployment capability in 1976, the 200th anniversary of the American Revolution."—The New Republic.

"I can assure you that my words are those of a devoted pacifist. My very hardest job is to give out medals of honor. If I lived in another country that wanted to be sure and retain its right of self-determination, I would say, 'Thank God that the United States exists at this moment in history.' We are not bent on conquest or on threatening others. But we do have a nuclear umbrella that can protect others. This is the moral force behind our position. We could be a terrible threat to the world if we were to lose that restraint."—Richard Nixon, interview with C.L. Sulzberger, New York Times, March, 1970.

Igloo White is a close brother of the system now operating in Laos and Cambodia, code name Commando Hunt. Its purpose is to cut supply lines by destroying all distinguishable targets such as bridges, power stations and dams. In order to hit these targets laser and t.v. guided bombs are used. The laser guided bomb follows a laser beam that is directed on the target by another plane while the t.v. guided bomb can be "flown" by the pilot to its desired target. It was first used in Laos, 1969.

Anti-personnel mines and anti-truck mines are another essential part of Commando Hunt. One of the newest anti-truck mines explodes when anything comes towards it. WAAPM are anti-personnel mines which explode on contact, shooting out small bomblets with trip wires attached. Anything that disturbs the wire is destroyed. CBU-24 are bombs the size of baseballs and are the "favorite" bomb on immediate reaction strikes. Hundreds are loaded in a normal bomb which, when released, splits open sending the bomblets spinning. One bomb will cover a football field with 250,000 pellets with the force equal to a half dozen sawed-off shotguns. A newer version has a time delayed fuse which after the initial attack is over will continue exploding randomly making it difficult to care for the wounded or repair damage.

"The bombing in Laos contributes to at least 75% of the refugees"—Sen. Edward Kennedy, Subcommittee on Refugees Hearings April 21-22, 1971

"All refugees talk about the bombing. They don't like (it). But even if you found an example in which it was proven conclusively that houses were bombed, so what?"—J. Williamson, USAID refugee relief chief, Vientianne, Feb. 2, 1971.

Ya, so what?

The Student Mobilization Committee to End the War meets every Monday in the Franklin Room to build opposition to this war and works through mass, legal, peaceful demonstration to accomplish its aims of immediate and total withdrawal of all U.S. troops and material from IndoChina.

Black And White Controversy

To the Editor:

After having considered and discussed extensively the arguments presented by both sides in the S.O.S.-Concert Committee issue, we feel that we can no longer remain silent on this question. Student funds must not be transferred by the Senate for use by S.O.S., Friends of Belchertown, or any similar group. While we feel deeply concerned about the utterly degrading condition of so-called "mental health facilities" such as Belchertown, we also feel that S.O.S. is distorting the issues involved, and that if the Senate were to transfer the monies it would accomplish little, if anything.

First, the Senate would be establishing a dangerous precedent by any such action. Scores of groups with very commendable goals could quite plausibly seek funds from the relatively limited coffers of student government; our objection is that these groups are essentially outside, non-University ones. Furthermore, misappropriation of funds could serve as an invitation for litigation against the Student Senate in the outside courts, removing the decision from the cases.

It has been charged that the proposed concert is an "extravaganza" which students should forfeit for a higher cause. This is outright distortion. When S.O.S. initially began seeking funds, Concert Committee funds were the only ones available, thus some rationale had to be found for pro-S.O.S., anti-concert. This most likely would have occurred regardless of what the available funds were being proposed for. Hard and fast value judgments simply cannot be made. It would be just as easy to argue that we should transfer Student Union funds, because people are hungry in Appalachia while we have color TV's and piped-in music in the Union. In reality, the concert monies represent less than 1-1/2% of the total the Senate has to work with.

S.O.S. has given no indication of how, specifically, the funds they want will be used, or of the financial status of the plaintiffs bringing suit, or whether any more viable alternatives have been sought, such as assistance from the Mass. Civil Liberties Union.

S.O.S. has, through its publicity, portrayed the situation as black and white; the state as evil and actively fighting reform, S.O.S. as the enemy of this evil. Armchair attorneys should not jump to conclusions as to the reasons for the Commonwealth's move for dismissal of the present suit in federal court. We are not saying that the state is all-good, far from it, but they should be given the chance to begin to remedy their own problems before any federal intervention. We are not saying that S.O.S. should not exist, but that they have made their debut at the wrong time and are mischannelling their efforts.

Lastly, we must protest the monopolization of the press by such S.O.S. advocates as Mssrs. Callahan and Medeiros, both Collegian staff members. We question the propriety of the extensive pro-S.O.S. coverage in a non-private, publicly funded medium.

No Hope Left

To the Editor:

I had just walked out of Consumer Survival Skills class and my head was throbbing with pain--having been bombarded with Gross National Product, conglomerates, government spending, and other irritable nitty gritty facts of life. I found myself trodding into the recreational room of Dickinson House where some sort of meeting was going on. As I approached, I noticed about thirty to forty girls who were apparently listening to a late, middle-aged man. Behind him I spied a neatly folded pile of fabric or perhaps dresses lying on a table. Intrigued I was, having never seen a fabric show or whatever it was, so I slid into an end seat in one of the last rows, trying not to disrupt what was going on. The only man in attendance, (beside myself) was in charge and immediately focused his eyes on me and asked if I was in the market for a hope chest. I said no, but asked if I could stay and listen. My request was turned down. The loud tittering which followed disheartened me, and I meekly left, muttering something to myself about how erotic it must be to look at fabric.

As I sit back and think now, I distinctly remember a nice shade of yellow which would make a very colorful patch on a pair of worn out dungarees.

No Guarantee

To the Editor:

Paul Hollander's letter of 2/29 is a clear example of faulty thinking and a lack of understanding about the process of learning. Aside from missing the basic point made in Dr. Simon's letter of the 16th, he made some serious allegations that cannot go unchallenged.

His first point is that the worst that can happen to a student who takes a typical university course is that he will be bored or waste his time. However, in the pursuit of a degree, the average student spends about 1,800 hours in the classroom. To disregard the brutal results of wasting any of these precious hours is far worse than the so-called dangers in learning about the self that are often cited about humanistic education.

To even consider learning apart from feeling is a denial of a most fundamental aspect of the learning process. There is no learning without feeling or feeling without learning. Plato said that reason must have an adequate emotional base if education is to accomplish its purpose. If there is no remotional base, or if it is an ersatz one, very little of significance can happen to a learner, except in the most negative terms. The four years that a young adult spends in college are years that must be spent in growing, questioning, experimenting, and living. These are years that are far too important to waste.

The second point that I question is about grading. Not many would disagree that evaluation is important to learning. But evaluation of what? For What? And by Whom? It is clear that self-evaluation is the most powerful and useful type of evaluation for learning. Evaluation by others can be useful, but not when it is forced on an individual. Rather than being helpful to learning, it works to destroy it.

More importantly, grades are not a useful form of evaluation. It is erroneous to assume that one implies the other. The letter "B" received on a grade card, for example, says nothing of what was well done, what needs improvement, how to improve, what future decisions must be made, and how to begin making them; the primary functions of evaluation. There is much written about grading and evaluation so I won't elaborate here. Let me just add that nothing makes the brutality of wasting time at the university so effective as having to receive a grade for it.

The notion about credentials is another topic that merits some discussion. However, as seen by the simplistic and narrow view of learning shown in Dr. Hollander's letter proves that professional certification (Ph.D.'s) is no guarantee of knowledge about learning.

There And Back Again

To the Editor:

Through doing volunteer work at Belchertown State School over the past year, I have become well aware of the subhuman living conditions that exist at this institution. I'm sure that most students at our university have also become aware of these conditions through various articles and editorials written in the Collegian. However, I'm not quite convinced that all of my fellow students fully realize what is behind such words as "subhuman or inhumane living conditions."

I recently read the brief submitted to the court by the Friends of Belchertown in their class action suit against the state. I feel that some quotes from this brief may be appropriate, in that they will show how inhumane and substandard these living conditions are.

Concerning the unsanitary conditions at the institution:

"In one case, larvae commonly referred to as maggots were found nesting in an open sore behind a resident's ear."

"In the infirmary, immobile and helpless residents have been subjected to flies and cockroaches crawling on them. Rats, mice and ants are also present."

Concerning lack of medical attention:

"Serious medical problems go undetected. Plaintiff ----- went home for the weekend and was hospitalized for internal bleeding by his family doctor. Plaintiff ----- broken nose was not noticed until he went home and the plaintiff-----'s son died of a condition that was easily relievable."

Concerning maintenance of the buildings:

"Due to the lack of screening, residents have fallen 15-20 feet over second-story railings to the ground."

These quotes were, of course, chosen to churn your stomachs and hopefully your minds. They simply show the worst of what is "inhumane or sub-human". They are the result, as all the problems at Belchertown are, of a lack of funds. The court case in which the Friends of Belchertown are fighting the department of mental health may force the legislature to appropriate the funds needed to alleviate these conditions. This court case will be expensive. I should hope that all of you feel this situation is grave enough to warrant some of your time and financial support. Think it over.

(There is a rumor that the governor will not entertain questions from the floor tonight. Come on down and see.)

Election Year Issue

To the Editor:

There are many issues in this election year. The one in which we are specifically asking your assistance is achieving peace in Southeast Asia and securing the release of our Prisoners of War and an accounting of our men who are missing in action.

A Non-Partisan Political Action Committee, consisting of families and friends of POWs/MIAs, has been formed to keep this issue before the public, throught the candidates, during the 1972 election campaign.

The POW/MIA issue, for better or worse, has become the focus for the settlement of the war. A negotiated settlement will deal with this. We are asking the students in American colleges and universities to make this a vital campaign issue. We think our interests lie together. The war is an issue -- for the POW/MIA families, for the nation, and for the people of Southeast Asia. This is the third Presidential election that POWs -- some young enough to be our classmates and some old enough to be your fathers -- have been imprisoned in Southeast Asia.

This year, 1972, is an eventful year in our country. It is the first time that 18-year olds will have the opportunity to express their opinions in a national election. Your views will have a great impact on our entire population. Because of this, we are writing for your support and assistance. It can be invaluable to us. There are 11.5 million Americans between the ages of 18 and 20 who have previously been shut out of the nation's political processes. This year the young voter has the opportunity to have a major impact on the outcome of the elections. Help us and our men by:

1. Writing letters to the candidates who are running in your state asking them what they are going to do if elected to settle the war and to gain the release of POWs and an accounting of the missing in Vietnam, Laos, and Cambodia.

2. Appearing at rallies of each candidate who comes to your area asking him publicly where he stands on the issue of the war and how he proposes to achieve peace in Southeast Asia.

3. Contacting or writing the delegates to the Democratic and Republican conventions urging them to state their positions on achieving peace and securing the release of our POWs and an accounting of the missing.

4. Contacting the Representatives and Senators who are running your State. The issue of the war and POW/MIAs will spill over into the House and Senate races running concurrently with the Presidential campaign. It can be equally as important to contact them as to contact the Presidential candidates.

5. Writing to the state Democratic and Republican party chairmen stating your views on achieving peace and the POW/MIA issue. This can have an effect on the party platform.

Our goal is to elicit a clear statement from each candidate as to what he intends to do -- a position on which he is willing to be judged at the polls. By election time we hope that all ambiguities in each candidate's plan will have been removed.

Please let us hear from you if there is anything that we can do to aid you in helping us in our campaign. We would be interested in knowing of any contact that you have made with candidates or delegates and what their response was to you.

Your involvement in this issue can be a strong moral force. VOTE FOR HIS LIFE. REGISTER NOW.

Upping The Tuition

Should students be taxed to pay for their education? Should a student whose father makes $20,000 a year pay the same tuition fee as a student who works 30 hours a week to put himself through school?

These questions are pertinent when discussing the issue of a tuition hike. Basically, tuition is a means of taxing a student to pay for a part of his education. At UMass-Amherst the total instructional cost of an education is $2400 annually. Students are required to pay only $200 or 9% of the total cost plus room, board and other fees.

This year Massachusetts, along with many other states, is experiencing a financial crisis. Evidence of this can be seen in Governor Sargent's budget cut for this school and for Belchertown State Hospital. Many people in governmental positions and some in the Legislature see a tuition hike as a possible means of raising new sources of revenue for the stat. The argument runs that by raising tuition more money would be available for scholarships and the remaining money would go to the State. However, money for scholarships and loans is not now, nor ever has been enough to meet the needs of students.

During the school year 1969-70, 72% of the undergrads at UMass-Amherst applied for scholarships, only 9% were granted any aid. Furthermore all money generated by a tuition hike would not be earmarked specifically for the use of institutions of higher education but goes into a general fund from which money is delegated to all Massachusetts departments. Money from a raise in your tuition could therefore go into paving Route 128 near Boston or providing an extra bonus in a welfare check.

The University and State Communications Council (USCC) has been working actively to represent student viewpoint on this issue. A conference of State and Community Colleges was held recently. Many representatives felt that students (especially those at community colleges) could not all afford the increase, but would probably go into debt to pay as there was no organized means of protesting. At the end of the conference, students felt that they could not support any of the bills presently before the Legislature because no study has been conducted to determine what the affect of a higher tuition would be upon low income students. It was decided that the best way to demonstrate student sentiment to Legislators would be to encourage students to write their individual senators and representatives and explain to them their financial situation and how a tuition increase would affect them.

It is your Legislator who decides whether you will pay a higher tuition next semester. There is a variety of bills which deal with tuition, (see related article on these pages), some of which would raise the annual tuition fee to $800 or $1400 or even $2400. If you feel you can't afford an increase of these proportions or if you can but have some reservations about supporting it, write or talk to your Legislators. A sample letter appears elsewhere on this page and can be used as a model for writing your Representative. USCC will be sponsoring a booth in the Campus Center lobby next Thursday and Friday. Fact sheets on tuition and arguments against a higher tuition fee will be available. If you have any questions regarding this issue, stop by the table or come to RSO Office 126 any afternoon.

In any case USCC and the Collegian urge you to write your Representative or Senator. The listing appears on this page. Direct communication is the most effective way of letting him know your feelings. Let him know exactly how a tuition increase will effect your chances of graduating from UMass.

Dear Representative Smith:

State clearly how proposed tuition legislation interests you and how it will effect you. Explain why you oppose/favor or question a raise in tuitions.

Be specific. Refer to the subject or the bill. Mention you are a constituent of his.

Request action. Your legislators are elected to act, so tell him what action you would like him to take. Ask for an answer. You are entitled to know where he stands.

About The Series

The Collegian and the University and State Communications Council are presenting the information on these pages in an effort to facilitate students soliciting support from their legislators.

Due to space limitations, the list of legislators will have to be released in several parts during this week.

Let your legislator know how you feel.

Bills Analyzed

(USCC Analyzes the bills.)

There are presently four different types of bills before the State Legislature which provide for changing the tuition levels for in-state undergraduate students in Massachusetts' state colleges and universities. They include bills calling for tuition based on percentages of the instructional costs, the income of parents or students, percentages of instructional costs with payment deferred, and free tuition. There are also other bills which could raise tuition for out-of-state undergraduates and graduate students.

House Bill 1890 would set tuition between 35% and 55% of the instructional costs of attending a public school. Instructional costs at UMass-Amherst are estimated to be $2400, thus conceivably making tuition between $840 and $1320 per year on this campus. Another bill calls for percentages between 40% and 60%. The main purpose of this bill is to make the costs at public and private universities more competitive.

House Bill 2814 bases tuition on the income of the students or his parent. It would set tuition at $2000 for those who could afford it. For those who could not, tuition would be determined by first deducting $4000 from their parental or their own total annual income, then a $2000 deduction for every child; ten percent of this final total would be the tuition rate. For instance, a family of 2 adults and 3 children has a yearly income of $15,000. First, $4,000 would be deducted, bringing the figure to $11,000. Then $2000 for each child or $6,000 is deducted, bringing the total down to $5,000. Take ten percent of this-$500 and this would be the new tuition rate for one child in that family to attend UMass.

Income alone however is not a fair basis for tuition. Other factors such as the number of college age children and the number of working people in the family must be taken into account.

House Bill 2945 also calls for tuition based on percentages of instructional costs, between 40% and 60%. No tuition would be allowed to exceed $1,200 with up to $1,000 being deferred. Repayment would begin once income rose above $7500. However, it is not guaranteed that the amount of grants for this program will equal the need, nor have the qualifications for need been established. It may well end up that students would be given very little aid and a $1,200 tuition rate.

House Bill 1510 would provide for free tuition at all state colleges and universities. This bill, filed by Rep. Craven of Boston, has been defeated in the past and is given very little hope of passage this year.

Out-of-state students may be hit with a large increase this year. One bill calls for payment of tuition equal to what a Massachusetts resident would pay at the state university of the out-of-state student. Graduate students may get an increase to $600 for tuition.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

A reader named Craig, from Washington, D.C., writes to ask: "Is it true you once served as an astrologer for the armed services?" Answer: Yes. During World War II, I was "borrowed" from the Air Force on Okinawa to conduct an astrology program for Armed Forces Radio Service. I became the only American soldier given full time duty as an astrologer.

Women Gymnasts Defeat Westchester

By STEVE CARY

Last weekend in southeastern Pennsylvania, the Varsity Women Gymnasts defeated Westchester State College, 97 to 92. Missing the performances of co-captain Betsy East and all-around competitor Marina Rodriguez, the younger members of the team worked to the satisfaction of Coach Evans in contributing to their fourth win of this season.

Freshman Jeannine Burger led this meet with an all-around score of 33.30, and wins on the Side Horse Vault, and Uneven Bars. She is apparently recovered from an ankle injury in late February, and has managed to improve consistently as well. Second in the all-around was Westchester's Darlene Rose who totalled 32.80, and carried the major competitive load for her team that evening, and at 31.95, Margie Combs was third, suffering a minor illness.

On the Floor Exercise, Anne Vexler took a first for UMass at 8.65, which was her highest placing this year. Anne generally improves consistently as the season progresses toward the championship meets, scoring her best under the most pressure. Margie Combs made second five-hundredths of a point behind Anne at 8.6, and Darlene Rose was yet another five-hundredths in third at 8.55. Jeannine Burger won her first event on the Side Horse Vault with an 8.65, with Darlene Rose in an 8.55 second, and Margie Combs third scoring 8.2. Anne Vexler took a second win on the Balance Beam with a low 7.65. It seems that the beam was again "unsteady" as it has been in the previous two meets. Gymnastics is to an extent dependent on the quality of the equipment available. Jeannine Burger managed a second here with 7.35, and Darlene Rose made third a 7.2. Finally, on a set of uneven bars that required the weight of four people on its corners to keep it relatively stable, Jeannine Burger finished her fine evening's work with an 8.9 to win the event. Darlene Rose and Margie Combs then made it close for second and third with 8.55 and 8.50 respectively, and the meet concluded.

Next weekend the team will be at its full strength again. They travel to Towsend State College in Maryland for their final dual meet of the season. Last year Towsend was coached by this year's UMass coach, Virginia Evans. Towsend has never won a match with UMass, and should not begin this year. With the Eastern Championships at Springfield on the following weekend, this meet will serve as the final test before the most important trial the women will have to face so far this year. They appear to be ready for a win at the Easterns, so plan to go to Springfield the weekend after next to support their effort.

Girls Lose To Plymouth

Although UMass played their game; close, defensive and for the most part, hustling, they came out just 8 points shy of a victory over Plymouth State last week, 49-41.

Those eight points reflect considerably more than just a victory margin enjoyed by Plymouth; they represent a set pattern that the UMass girls have been trying desperately to break all season long. This game, like so many others this season, was unbelievably close throughout, with one and two point leads exchanging hands until well into the fourth quarter. And then, suddenly, UMass found themselves behind by ten and struggling just to keep it at that. Although they had more than their share of foul shot ttempts,

The game moved at a not-so-fast pace, by half-time it was Plymouth, 24-22. UMass briefly held the lead during the third quarter, but Plymouth came back to nose ahead, 32-29.

Play resumed in the forth and the see-saw battle continued. About half-way through the quarter, Plymouth burst the game open with a ten point surge and never looked back. It ended in a frustrating defeat for UMass, 49-41.

Beth Fay and Pat Glispen led UM scorers with ten points each, with Marilyn Ritz close behind, adding nine points and an all-around good game. Vicki Pagel and Chris Molonea contributed 4 points each and Sue Chapman and Jeanne Abrahamson chipped in 4 between them.

Hope Lies In Sox Pitchers

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. (AP) — Pitching, specifically the lack of it, is the Boston Red Sox' No. 1 problem annually. Maybe, just maybe, things will be different in the American League race this year.

Manager Eddie Kasko has 18 pitchers in camp, and only one or two jobs are open. The regular season opener in Boston April 6 is a long way off, but nine spots seem assured.

Kasko feels the current edition is the best team he has had since he took over as manager in the fall of 1969. He likes the new speed and versatility. He likes several promising youngsters. But most of all, he likes the added depth in his pitching staff.

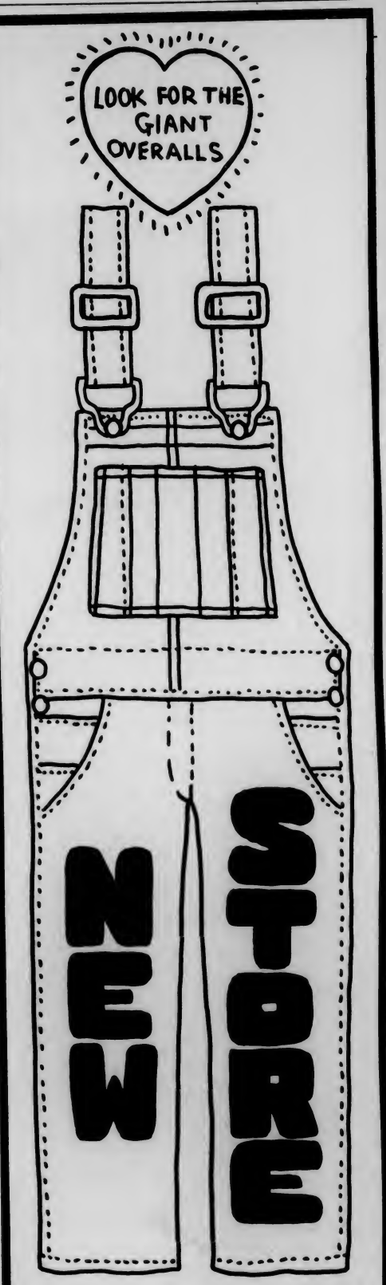
"I think we really helped ourselves in getting Marty Pattin and Lew Krausse, in addition to Tommy Harper, in the trade with Milwaukee," Kasko says. "Pattin and Krausse are established pitchers. Any team would like to have them."

Pattin, who had a 14-14 record with the lowly Brewers last season, will step into a regular starting role. Krausse was figured upon originally as a spot starter and long reliever, but the 28-year-old right-hander is bidding for a berth in the regular starting rotation.

Barring injuries, or a possible trade, seven other pitchers seem assured of jobs in Boston this summer. They are veterans Ray Culp, Sonny Siebert, Gary Peters, Sparky Lyle, Bill Lee, Ken Tatum, and young prospect Rogelio Moret.

"I would prefer to take only 10 pitchers when we leave Florida, but circumstances may force us to go with 11 at the start of the season," Kasko says.

Rookies Len McGlothen, Terry Barr, Dick Pole and Terry Williams, all outstanding prospects for the future, appear to be at least another year or two away. That leaves three veterans and a pair of rookies battling for no more than a pair of jobs, possibly only one if the top nine pitchers stay healthy.



Of course, anything can happen at spring training. And things just have a way of happening around the Red Sox. However, the five fighting to stick are Bob Bolin, Luis Tiant, and Mike Nagy, all right-handed veterans, and rookies Mike Garmen, a right-hander, and Jack Curtis, a left-hander.

Bolin had a 5-3 record in 52 appearances with the Red Sox last season while Tiant had a disappointing 1-7 mark. Nagy, who won 12 games a rookie in 1969, has divided his time between Boston and Louisville of the International League, failing to live up to his first year promise.

Garmen, a Red Sox' No. 1 draft choice after graduation from high school in 1967, needs only to conquer control problems to win a major league berth. He throws just about as hard as anyone in baseball. Curtis is a fringe player getting another shot and definitely has to prove he belongs in the big time.

LEW KRAUSSE AND Marty Pattin, two new pitchers for the Boston Red Sox this year, go through their back bending exercises during training campt at Winter Haven, Fla. Obtained from Milwaukee for five Boston players, Krausse and Pattin are among the 18 pitchers manager Eddie Kasko is expecting to lead the club to the pennant this year. (AP Wirephoto)

Gymnasts Vie For Title

By JANE CROOK

The top college gymnasts in the East will be in action this weekend, March 9-11, as Penn. State hosts the 45th Annual Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League Championships. The three day season finale will decide individual champions, finalize league standings, and determine the league's representatives to the National's, as well as selecting individuals from the East for the NCAA Championships to be held at the Univ. of Iowa in April.

Participating teams will include UMass, Springfield, Syracuse, Pittsburg, Army, Navy, Temple, and Penn. State. Last year's winner, Penn. State, is presently undefeated in competition, and is heavily favored to regain the league title. UMass is going to have to come up with some stupendous performances to even come close to Penn. State's amazing last year total of 163.55.

In individual competition each school has several competitors who will be vying for top honors. Coach Erik Kjeldsen's Redmen are capable of placing a number of performers in the finals, and should place several medal winners. Last year UMass fared very well, scoring 158.1, qualifying seven men for the finals, winning four medals, and sending one man, Dave Genest, to the Nationals.

This year in the all-around competition Tony Vacca and Steve Scuderi will pace the Redmen. Vacca finished second in this year's New England's, and fourth in the Easterns last season. He also qualified for the Eastern finals last year on longhorse vaulting and highbar, but had to scratch due to a shoulder injury sustained the previous day. They will receive stiff competition from Penn. State's sensational Marshall Avener. A strong candidate for the

Tony Vacca

'72 Olympics. Avener was a member of the U.S. team to the World Games, and a member of the U.S. National team which hosted the Japanese last month.

The Redmen's John Calabria will be the top floor specialist for the team. He finished second in the New England's this season, as well as placing sixth in the East last year, and is looking for a strong finish to his varsity career. Jack Berner will also be a strong contender on floor for UMass.

On sidehorse Steve Nelson and Rich Seikunas will be challenging performers such as Navy's Swanson and Worthington. Worthington is the defending pommel horse champion. Seikunas turned in an impressive performance at the New England's taking third place.

Jay Thompsen, the Redmen's most consistent vaulter, will be representing UMass' hopes for a medal on the long horse. Thompsen led all competitors in the optional vault last year with a 9.45 score, but missed the finals because of trouble with his compulsory.

Junior Jay Aronstein, the number one ringman in New England, will be trying to follow a brilliant, well-controlled performance of this past weekend. After having placed fourth in the Easterns last year and missing the Nationals by .15 of a point, Aronstein has an excellent chance of a high finish this week. With still another year of competition remaining he could develop into the top ringman in the East. Junior Donny Spier will strengthen the UMass ring team after a strong performance and a fourth place finish in the New England's.

Co-captain Dave Genest will be carrying the Redmen's hopes for a strong showing on the parallel bars. Last year Genest was the highest UMass finisher as he won p-bars with a final total of 18.15. In becoming the Eastern League champion he qualified to compete in the Nationals in Michigan last April. In the Eastern's awards ceremony, Genest was flanked on all sides by members of Penn. State's team, as they took second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth in the event, making the competition look extremely tight this year.

Providing his back is willing, Tom Mylicki will be top specialist for the Redmen on high bar. Last year, Slick's final total of 17.125 earned him fifth place in the East.

This past weekend in Boston, UMass placed second in the New England's behind a surprisingly strong So. Conn. effort. The sensational Johnny Crosby led the Owls with his incredible 55.05 all-around total and five first place finishes. UMass' Jay Aronstein was the only competitor to edge out Crosby as Aronstein won the still rings event with a 18.4 total. Dave Genest finished a close second to Crosby on parallel bars with a total of 18.1. Going into the finals Crosby had a .1 of a point lead over Genest and held on to it for first place honors.

UMass had a good day overall as they scored 155.45, and placed eight men in the finals. Co-captain Tony Vacca captured second in the all-around with a 50.3 total, and tied for second on the high bar. Vacca also made the finals on long horse (5th) and parallel bars(4th).

Other Redmen qualifying for the finals were John Calabria, who placed second, and Jack Berner on floor; Rich Seikunas, who took third on sidehorse; Jay Thompsen on longhorse; Danny Spier on rings; and Steve Scuderi, who tied with Vacca for second on high bar.

The team leaves tomorrow for Penn. State with competition beginning Thursday night with compulsory exercises being conducted in all events. Friday's session will feature optional routines, as team and all-around totals will be decided. The final session on Saturday will highlight the individual finals in all events.

UMass will be hoping for a strong finish in the team standings as well as the individual placings. The Redmen will be looking for a clear second place finish ahead of Springfield and Temple. The Easterns will provide a chance for all interested to see outstanding performances of some of the top gymnasts in the nation.

The Rink "First Priority"

By BILL BALLOU

"There is no question that our first priority as far as athletic buildings go is to get ice on campus. Now whether or not it's an indoor facility or outdoor facility is another question."

David Bischoff is the Acting Athletic Director and one of his chief concerns, as he indicated in the preceding statement, is to bring some semblance of ice to a campus that has none. The lack of an ice facility has always been a problem on a campus of this size and prestige, but the problem has become especially acute in recent years with the advent of quality hockey at UMass and the boom in hockey-playing, figure skating and other ice sports.

THAT'S P.J. FLAHERTY, who gives two people fits: his coach and opposing shooters.

For these and other reasons it has become apparent that using the ice time provided by Amherst College in the form of Orr Rink is simply inadequate. Something must be done.

Bischoff is working on a solution and right now that solution seems to lie along the lines of an outdoor facility, hopefully a temporary one.

"We must have ice and right now we're pointing toward an outdoor facility," Bischoff said. "With refrigeration and probably a chain link fence around it, something along these lines. From there, we'd like to go to a covered building, but our main objective right now is simply getting ice."

All of this talk of rink, outdoor or indoor, depends on the financial situation, of course, but at best an outdoor rink can really be considered only a stop gap measure. The ideal would contain "minimum seating for 6,000 students, bleacher style, with connected locker rooms that could also be used by other sports," according to Bischoff.

All the talk about a rink, indoor or outdoor, is fine, but the main concern right now is not determining whether or not one is needed, but how to finance any kind of facility. Getting the money is not going to be easy.

"We could use the money we currently pay out for ice rental toward a new facility," said Bischoff, "but that is not the answer. Basically we look toward three possibilities for financing. The first is some kind of legislative funding, the second some sort of help from alumni, and friends of the university, and thirdly, some student input."

The term "some student input" is sure to raise questions such as how much input and what's to keep this thing from becoming a campus center?

Since there are no specifics as of yet concerning the fact that there is enough money to even build a facility, there can be no definite statement on what it would cost the student. Bischoff is talking of something in the vicinity of five to ten dollars each, but can't make any definite statement. He can make a definite statement about what won't happen, however.

"There definitely won't be any kind of open-ended financing where the student is taxed so much one year and then something else the next. It is our policy to set one fee and then simply charge that for perpetuity." Bischoff went on to cite the stadium fee as the way these things are handled by the athletic department.

Money is hard to come by, and by no means is a rink anything likesa sure thing. But Bischoff has established it as the number one priority for new buildings, certainly a step in the right direction. He's worried about where the money is going to come from and sees an outdoor rink as a temporary measure.

But at least progress is being made. All the planning and hoping will not bring a rink without the proper financing. The evidence for a rink has been hashed and rehashed in previous MDC stories. it is very one-sided.

This university needs a rink.

V-Ball Team Takes Third

Springfield College repeated as the New England volley ball champion last Saturday when the top six New England teams met at the Springfield College fieldhouse in double round robin tournament.

This marked the first year the University of Massachusetts was represented in such competition. The team which was only formed last November, made a good showing and finished third. They are currently ranked number three in New England, behind Yale and Springfield College.

UMass opened the tournament with impressive victories over Boston State (15-2, 15-2), and Westfield State (15-8, 15-4) to set up the early pace with Springfield College, who was then holding a 4-0 record, after blanking U.R.I. and Western State. Then the Redmen ran into trouble. A hot U.R.I. team surprised them 2-0 (15-8, 15-11), after the Redmen had to sit out for one hour, drawing a bye. UMass bounced right back, taking U.N.H. by 15-4, 15-4.

This set the ground for a dramatic finale against S.C., which was 8-0 at the time. Two Redmen victories would have created a three-way tie (S.C., U.R.I., UMass), forcing the tournament into playoff games. But S.C. was too much for the young UMass team to handle. After leading last year's NCAA finalists 4-3 early in the game, they suddenly folded, losing 15-8. The second game turned into a seesaw battle, with the Redmen leading most of the way, but nevertheless losing 19-17.

Rhode Island finished second, with an 8-2 record. UMass, 6-4, captured third place, followed by Westfield State, Boston State, and U.N.H. Yale University was unable to participate due to an automobile accident suffered a few days before.

Player-coach Yorgos Courmouzis was selected on the first team all-New England. Paul Slack made the second team, with Bruce Simpson also receiving the votes.

Sarge Halts Montague Dump

By MARK VOGLER

Gov. Francis W. Sargent told a crowd of 1200 in the Student Union Ballroom last night that he intended to call an immediate halt to the Montague Sanitary Landfill Project until a total environmental analysis of all aspects of the proposal has been completed and a master plan for solid waste disposal throughout the Commonwealth has been drafted.

"I want to make it clear that from now on, no state site will be approved without a complete environment review and full public participation," the governor said.

"But the public must continue to pressure government, to look over the shoulders at every move we make. And government must make every decision with one eye on its environmental impact," Sargent told the crowd.

The University budget and Belchertown were brought up during a sometimes heated question and answer period following the Governor's speech. Sargent promised to visit Belchertown State School within a month to view the conditions there. Questionned on budget cuts for the school, he promised to look into the matter.

On the budget cuts he said that overall the University budget was upped seven and a half million. The fact that no new faculty positions were authorized in his proposed budget for fiscal '73 he said would not effect the student-faculty ratio at the University. Sargent said it was now 13-1 and his proposed budget would up that to 14-1, still below the key 15-1 figure.

Governor Sargent in the midst of a crowd of students after his speech. His welcome varied; the crowd at times clapping or shouting complaints. (MDC Photo by Bruce McConnell)

Sargent's figures contradict those from Whitmore which show a 15-1 ratio now, and predict a 16-1 ratio for next year if the Governor's budget is passed by the General Court unchanged.

The Governor said he would file with the General Court a legislative package providing for the mandatory formation of solid waste regional districts. The enactment of such legislation would give the state the authority to mandate solid waste districts and to assist cities and towns within a district for the costs of operating this district.

As for the Montague problem, Sargent said that the situation reflects our own difficulties and is echoing across the state. The Governor incited a spontaneous reaction of applause and verbal agreements from the audience by elaborating on the magnitude of the problem.

"Every day each of us throws away about seven pounds of refuse. In a year, the state must rid itself of seven million tons of waste. In 10 years, we could bury the entire city of Boston--43 square miles--under a pile of garbage 100 feet high.

"And not only is there simply too much refuse. Our current methods of disposal are a failure ecologically and financially. We have a system called sanitary landfill. In reality, landfills are nothing more than open dumps, dumps that are a threat to the health and an insult to the senses of everyone," the Governor stated.

Four weeks ago, the Governor established a Solid Waste Council, comprised of his Secretaries of Environmental Affairs, Transportation, and Human Services. He asked them to forward a list of recommended actions to him

Gov. Sargent, after reviewing the Montague crisis in relation to the entire Commonwealth, disclosed his "master plan". In establishing a Special Office of Environmental Protection, the Governor feels that the development of a solid waste master plan will be observed, and that a detailed environmental review of all proposed sites for disposal will be conducted.

The Raytheon Service Corporation is currently doing a comprehensive study of present disposal efforts in the state and is expected to reach completion in three weeks. The findings of the corporation will serve as the basis to the foundation of the master plan. Adoption of the plan is expected to take place the first of next year.

In closing his speech to the university community, Gov. Sargent urged the Massachusetts citizenry to get involved.

"Government decisions cannot be made any longer in the vacuum of a given department's special interest. It will require more than one kind of expert to answer questions like the disposal of our waste.

"We must recognize that effective, long-range planning incorporating citizen participation is no longer a luxury in solving environmental problems. It is a necessity."

As was anticipated by those in attendance last night who had also heard Atty. Gen. Robert Quinn speak in regard to consumerism, the question and answer period that followed

Muskie Takes It, But Lacks Majority

MANCHESTER, N.H. (AP)-Sen. Edmund S. Muskie captured New Hampshire's leadoff presidential primary Tuesday night over the strong second-place showing of Sen. George McGovern.

It as a victory short of the towering expectations Muskie called his phantom opponent.

With 60 per cent of the anticipated Democratic vote counted, Muskie was polling 48 per cent of the ballots cast, well ahead of McGovern and the field, but short of an absolute majority on his New England home territory.

President Nixon scored an easy Republican victory over two opponents, who scored 30 per cent of the GOP vote between them. Nixon's rivals congratulated each other on cutting into the President's vote.

"I think I did very well indeed," said Muskie. He said his showing had to be measured against the fact that his campaign is spread thin across all the primary states, and he faced the opposition of New Hampshire's biggest newspaper, the Manchester Union Leader.

Muskie, a blackboard behind him showing his vote total at less than 50 per cent, said the voting in the New Hampshire presidential primary showed the "people want a definite and clear cut end to this war."

The principle competition for the Maine Democrat during the primary campagin came from Sen. George S. McGovern, D-S.D., the most emphatic peace candidate in the five-man Democratic field.

McGovern's name on the blackboard behind Muskie's speaker's podium showed the South Dakotan with 34 per cent of the vote, far better than had been expected by political observers.

"The people of New Hampshire believe not only that the war is wrong, but that the war stands between us and our future," Muskie told a hotel ballroom jammed with his confetti-covered backers.

"I intend to take that message on to the primaries in the other states," he said.

The important objectives for his campaign, Muskie said, was "to put together our total resources over the 24 state primaries in such a way that we are going to win our objective in July. Our ultimate objective is to elect a new president of the United States."

McGovern said his showing in the New Hampshire primary Tuesday was "a victory for the Democratic process in this country."

"We have every cause to be pleased," he said. "I don't think Muskie is going to get 50 per cent."

Early returns showed him doing better than the 25 per cent of the Democrat vote that he had said previously would be a respectable showing.

"What the voters have demonstrated is that they will not be dictated to by the pollsters and sloganeers," McGovern said.

"They listened to what I had to say. They heard my continual insistence that we must end this miserable war in Southeast Asia."

For the some 500 youthful supporters who were jammed shoulder to shoulder in a small motel ballroom, it was a victory statement.

McGovern also said he had gained headway in his quest for the Democratic nomination.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson, one of the corps of rivals awaiting Muskie in the Florida presidential primary a week away, said the front-runner had failed to make a good showing in New Hampshire.

Jackson said that "indicates the Democratic nomination is wide open."

Democratic National Chairman Lawrence F. O'Brien said in New Haven, Conn., he thought McGovern and Muskie had both done well.

He said McGovern demonstrated a "basic strength" not reflected in national polls, which rate him the presidential choice of only 6 per cent of Democrats.

O'Brien said he had expected

Governor Says Aid Needed For Hospital

By DON SAINT-PIERRE

Governor Francis Sargent said last night in a conversation after his speech in the S.U. Ballroom, that in the future the state must "provide assistance" to hospitals in Worcester in their plans for future expansion.

His response was made to a question regarding the current crisis the Worcester hospitals are facing as construction begins on the UMass medical school hospital. The new 400-bed hospital, which will be used to train the future doctors, comes at a time when the existing hospitals already have a surplus of beds.

Sargent said the situation arose from lack of communications between the existing hospitals in planning their individual expansion. He said there was an extreme amount of duplicity there and that his office had already begun making arrangements between them to eliminate this.

He said he has asked the Memorial Hospital not to add their planned additional floor, and that other extra X-ray facilities and special treatment rooms would now be used jointly.

"The problem is apparently a result of lack of communications between the hospitals and lack of foresight in past administrations when the medical school and its hospitals were being planned," Sargent said.

Construction was begun on the medical school last year and ground-breaking on the school's hospital is due to begin shortly.

Two months ago, the Boston Globe disclosed the surplus bed situation saying the already existing hospitals were not being used to capacity (discounting the surplus required for emergencies). The article also said that, even with the surplus, the hospitals were continuing to expand.

Shortly after the Globe article, Sargent called a freeze on construction of the medical school hospital saying that he would "review the situation."

Last week, the Governor's office announced that the school's hospital would go ahead as planned and that plans had been worked out with the private hospitals in their expansion plans.

Sargent said that "in the future, the state would have to provide assistance to Worcester's hospitals in their planning. This would eliminate any possible reoccurrence of the problem."

Governor On Budgets

Gov. Sargent's well prepared address was the highlight of the night.

There were relatively few significant questions which prodded the credence of his proposals.

Many of the questions fired at Gov. Sargent pursued the hotly contested budget cuts at UMass and Belchertown and the proposed tuition increase.

"There's a difference between cutting a budget and cutting a budget request," replied the Governor. "And in the case of UMass, we have been forced to cut back the budget request, but the university is not losing since they are getting seven million dollars more than they got last year.

"In regard to Belchertown, where the occupancy has dropped in one year from 1400 to 1100, I want to see it reduced even more and more. We've got to get the mentally retarded out of huge institutions of this sort and into community base centers where they can get better attention and a more intimate relationship."

blurted out from the audience. "Those were budget cuts, not request cuts," the unidentified party said. Sargent said that he wasn't aware of the matter and that he would check into it.

Joe Sylvia, chairman of SOS, asked the Governor his opinion on a case in federal court pertaining to the Belchertown State School and the constitutional rights of the residents of the school. Sargent said that as Governor he could not involve himself in a legal case of this type.

The Governor, in response to another question from the floor, stated that he would check into an alleged cutback by his office of $200,000 of funds relating to food services at the state school.

Someone asked the Governor would he care to take a guided tour of Belchertown in order to stress the poor conditions of the institution.

The Governor's response: "I've been there before and I'm looking forward to going again. I can't go tomorrow, but maybe I'll get there sometime within the next month or so. I'll be there, but I just don't want to guarantee any particular day."

A young lady drew a healthy ovation when she challenged Gov. Sargent with the inquiry of whether the industry runs our government or the people run our government. The Governor was unclear in his defense, and obviously uncomfortable and caught off guard on this one. But he muttered something to the effect that: "If you would go to an Industrial meeting with me, you would see that they raise more hell with me in regard to government control and certain restrictions."

An important question arose on the topic of tuition in a press conference after his speech. The Governor was asked: "If you want a graduated tuition increase which you said would require more scholarship money, why is it that your scholarship money for next year was not increased when the plan is due to go into effect if passed?"

Gov. Sargent's answer: "Scholarship money will come from increased tuition of high income students and out- of-staters."

Toward the end of the inquiry, the atmosphere in the ballroom grew tense. At times, stray shouts emerged from the crowd indicating dissatisfaction of the Governor's answer for a particular question. And every time a student openly put the Governor on the spot, the crowd showed its recognition. It seems that the question and answer period diverted from the major primaces of Governor Sargent's speech, and the Governor was not equal to the challenge.

Muskie Fails To Get Majority

McGovern "would show strength beyond the figures shown in the national polls-and he's certainly done that tonight."

In separate delegate selection contests, Muskie entries were leading in incomplete returns for all 20 Democratic national convention seats at stake in the primary.

In the Republican primary, it was evident from the outset that, as his old campaign slogan had it, Nixon was the one.

His supporters led for all 14 Republican convention votes.

With 47 per cent of the expected vote counted, the tally was: Nixon, 33,071, or 69 per cent. Rep. John M. Ashbrook of Ohio, 1,338, or 10 per cent.

McCloskey told his supporters he expected to continue his presidential campaign, which he had said would end if he failed to get 20 per cent of the vote.

"On to Massachusetts and then to Rhode Island," he said, referring to two later primaries.

"I think we showed the President something," liberal McCloskey told conservative Ashbrook.

"We showed just the tip of the iceberg," Ashbrook replied. He said dissatisfaction with the administration "runs even deeper than what we've seen here."

In the voting for Vice-President, Spiro T. Agnew won the endorsement of the New Hampshire Republicans for re-nomination Tuesday night, Endicott Peabody, a former Massachusetts governor, was the second-place choice of Democratic voters.

Peabody put his name on the primary ballot and campaigned for the job.

Tuition Hike Debated

By DON BISHOP

(BOSTON)-Gardener Auditorium in the Massachusetts State House was the scene yesterday for a morning and afternoon of debate on the subject of tuition increases for state college students next year. A Joint Committee of Education heard testimony from legislators, school officials and students on a variety of bills all dealing with this subject.

UMass President Robert Wood and Student Senate President Lee Sandwen delivered the major addresses against the move to raise tuition for in-state students. Both spoke in specific opposition to the two major bills at yesterday's hearing; presented by Rep. Charles Long, and by Rep. Martin Linsky (for a bill from Rep. Francis Hatch).

Hatch's bill would create what is called "deferred tuition" where a student could postpone payment of tuition over $200 until after he is finished with college and earning $7500 a year. Long's bill in a sense would base tuition for in-state students on "ability to pay". Here conceivably many low income students would be paying no tuition whatsoever, while students who parents are in the upper income brackets could pay up to a ceiling level of $2000.

In addition to the statements made by Wood and Sandwen, others peaking in opposition to these bills and for the most part to the issue of tuition increase in general included: Rep. David Leiserman, the President of Worcester State College, a representative from the American Federation of Teachers, Prof. Joseph Burroughs of the UMass Faculty Senate, Student Trustees from various state schools, and David Coleman from the UMass Young Republicans Club.

Highlights from Pres. Wood's speech follow below:

"I speak today as chairman of a special ad hoc committee of the Advisory Commission to the Board of Higher Education.

"...Efforts to increase tuition for public higher education are not new. Except for the deferred payment features of H. 2945 and the new proposals of Governor Sargent which are not before you today, these bills are very similar to those of a year ago and a year before that. We opposed them then and we oppose them now. We continue to believe in low tuition public higher education.

"We are keenly aware--as I know this Committee is also--of three conflicting pressures, each of great weight, at work on the tuition issues:

--the deepening financial crisis facing the Commonwealth with growing demands in many sectors of public activity;

--the precarious financial stability of many private institutions; and

--the need to offer educational opportunity to all Massachusetts residents, thousands of whom find existing cost levels at public institutions a barrier to attendance.

"We respect the efforts of the Governor and others to seek equitable solutions to these dilemmas. The Ad Hoc Committee will continue to study all proposals with considerable care. We are prepared to recommend to our Boards that they review most seriously the present tuition charges in effect at all levels. As reflected in several bills before you, tuition for out-of-state students is one area where an increase may well be in order.

"...All available studies indicate that most high income suburban high school students are already going on to college. Our state colleges and universities are going to draw their increased enrollments from families of low and lower-middle incomes.

"Tuition is only a fraction of the financial support required to ensure educational opportunity for these students. The average stipend for disadvantaged students at the University--from State funds alone--is $720 on the Boston campus and $910 at Amherst. The average cost of attending the University of Massachusetts at Amherst--tuition, fees, room and board--is $1,747; which places it, incidentally, 19th among the 85 largest public universities. If the tuition increased only $100, it would be 10th--the 10th most expensive public university in the entire country.

"...To attach a "sliding scale" on tuitions this high is merely to compound the problem. Equitable assessment, again, would involve almost individual determination, based on family size, savings and financial assets, and other variables. Many students are "emancipated" and their personal incomes are very low, regardless of their family incomes. How could this situation be treated fairly?

"Deferred payment alone is not an answer, but it deserves study and we welcome the chance to consider it. Pending such study we would only point out that it is the students with greatest need who would be most reticent to incur debt obligations, even when these are theoretically tied to future earning power.

"...We close as we began. In all of the debate and discussion over who should pay for what, let no one forget where we stand on the basic issue: in a democratic society, it is in the public interest to provide low-tuition public higher education."

Highlights of Lee Sandwen's speech included:

"I oppose the pending legislation because of the harm it could do to the state's commitment to public

Talk Doesn't Mean Action

By ROBERT MEDEIROS

As was expected, Gov. Francis W. Sargent's prepared speech on environment was overshadowed by the question and answer period which on the most part dealt with the Governor's recommended cuts on the requested budgets for UMass and the Belchertown State School. Sargent covered three major topics last night; the Belchertown School, UMass and the environment. Unfortunately, Sargent's politically motivated remarks mean that the people of Massachusetts will be the ones who lose out in the end. To say that Sargent has refused to cope with the issues at hand would be a gross understatement.

"The retarded are going to be treated better and better," said Sargent to a question concerning his policies at Belchertown. It is not surprising for a Massachusetts governor to make a general statement of this type. The fact of the matter is that Sargent recommended in his budget to the state legislature that the Belchertown requested budget be cut by almost 40 per cent.

Sargent has not responded to the definite need for change at the school during his administration. A special commission of the Massachusetts House and Senate, formed to study conditions at Belchertown, said in their report of March, 1971, "We are totally dissatisfied with the manner in which Belchertown is being administered."

Despite what the Governor said last night, the fact is that the Sargent administration has refused to push for reform at Belchertown. Actions are more important than words, and Sargent's recent recommendations concerning budget cuts, clearly show that his actions toward the school have been inadequate and hypocritical.

On the question of the UMass recommended budget, Sargent responded that there was indeed a cut on the requested budget, but he increased the fiscal '73 budget by $7.5 million over the current budget. It appears someone forgot to tell the Governor that there has been not only a 6 per cent cost of living increase, but also a 6 to 7 per cent increase in inflation. In other words, these increases will eat away practically the whole $7.5 million before it can even be put to use for new programs.

Sargent has presented UMass with a standstill budget which increases funds only to cover the increased cost of what the University does now. Sargent said last night that the University is currently operating under a 13-1 faculty to student ratio, and under his cuts, the ratio would only be increased to 14-1.

The UMass hierarchy has said that the University is presently operating under a 15-1 faculty to student ratio. The point is that whatever the ratio under Sargent's recommendations, 860 additional students will be accepted to the UMass-Amherst campus and no additional faculty positions will be provided to meet the increase. Students will be severely hurt by the cuts in that they will be faced with still larger classes and, of course, less individual attention. It is difficult to believe that the Governor is not leading UMass toward a second-rate reputation as a public university.

In regard to sanitary landfill projects, Sargent's remarks did not hold great promise in the area of fighting pollution on a wide-scale basis. He said, "I am afraid that, for the time being, we must face the fact that sanitary landfill and incineration are still our most desirable and primary methods of disposal." It is unfortunate that when many states are now moving in the direction of resource recycling, that our governor feels that landfill projects are still our most primary and desirable means disposal. If Massachusetts is to face the environmental crisis, it is obvious that we start fighting pollution now, and not in the future.

It would indeed be a shock if Massachusetts were to do something innovative in the area of fighting the social ills which now face our society. While we're still talking about landfill sites and projects, other states are talking about recycling. It was a pleasure to learn that the governor has ordered an immediate halt to the Montague sanitary landfill project pending the completion of a total environmental analysis. But, if Massachusetts is to wage an effective campaign against pollution, then it is clear that Sargent must order an immediate and binding halt to all future landfill projects pending an in depth study of available recycling methods for the state.

In The Nation And The World

Rogers Sees Peace But Hits Soviets

WASHINGTON (AP) — Secretary of State William P. Rogers said Tuesday 1972 holds fresh opportunities for peace, but he coupled a 10-point outline of foreign policy optimism with some hard words about the Soviet Union.

In his introduction to the State Department's annual report on foreign relations, the secretary looked back on last year to say "few years will see the innovations or the fundamental changes of 1971. Nevertheless, I look forward to 1972 as a year of more than ordinary progress."

The 621-page report covered the same ground, although in more detail, as President Nixon's State of the World message, but there were a few new elements and movements from previous positions.

Rogers, for instance, for the first time gave high U.S. officials acknowledgement in writing that the former Pakistani province of East Bengal "is now separately governed."

This, combined with his first use of the name Bangladesh indicated the Nixon administration is very near to recognizing the new nation.

In a briefing with newsmen, the secretary would not provide details on the considerations concerning Bangladesh recognition, but he said the presence of Indian troops was an important factor in determining the timing on recognition.

The report, sent to the House Foreign Affairs Committee and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, signaled also that the administration wants to expand the concept of the current Strategic Arms Limitation Talks now going on with the Soviet Union.

"The initial agreements, as significant as they will be," Rogers said, "must be the start of a process of regulating nuclear arms in the interests of peace—a process now taking place primarily between the Soviet Union and the United States but one which should in time extend to others as well."

State Department officials indicated while this referred in general to all nuclear nations, it was aimed in particular at China.

It was China that led off Roger's 10 points for progress in 1972, which he said "is already the year in which, with the President's visit, we have broken the pattern of hostility between the United States and the People's Republic of China."

The next two points dealt with optimistic assessments of Nixon's May trip to Moscow and the possibility of reaching U.S.-Soviet agreement on limiting strategic arms.

The year also will see, according to the secretary, a "sustained effort" to continue the Mideast cease-fire and reach an interim settlement; enlargement of the European community and "movement toward reconciliation among all the nations of Europe."

There will be more attention paid to the Western Hemisphere, including a presidential visit to Canada and high-level trips to Latin America, Rogers said. He predicted advances in world economic conditions and added more will be done about solving such problems as drugs.

Rogers said the United Nations will get U.S. support toward efforts at reform.

The 10th point about 1972: "And it could be a year, if North Vietnam were to agree to a cease-fire in Indochina and to the release of our prisoners, in which U.S. troops could be totally withdrawn from South Vietnam."

The cloud over much of this is U.S. uncertainty about Soviet intentions, which Rogers indicated could lead to instability.

After saying Moscow showed responsibility in negotiating on arms control, restraint in the Berlin talks and cooperation in many other economic and social matters, Rogers added: "I cannot say, however, that the Soviet Union exercised great restraint in South Asia. It was not helpful in promoting peace in Indochina." And its record in the Middle East was at best mixed.

"Our relations will not be harmonious, therefore, until further evolution in Soviet thinking overcomes its temptation to exploit explosive situations for national advantage."

Douglas Wanted Tax-Free Reward

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP) — FBI informer Boyd Douglas, Jr., acknowledged today he asked the goverment for a tax-free $50,000 reward for evidence he obtained to prosecute antiwar priest Philip Berrigan and six others on conspiracy charges. He said his request was turned down.

Douglas, testifying at the Harrisburg Seven conspiracy trial, said an FBI agent told him "If my thoughts were along those lines I should forget about it."

Irving Goes to Court

NEW YORK (AP) — Author Clifford Irving went before a federal grand jury again today, presumably to tell more about his "autobiography" of Howard Hughes.

Both the federal jury and a county grand jury were reported ready to take joint action in the case this week, sources close to the proceedings said.

Government Gets Last Word

WASHINGTON (AP) — Just when you get used to spelling good old monofluorotrichloromethane, the goverment wants to change it.

Somebody in official Washington realized you've been doing it wrong all this time. Now some of the best minds in government are pondering whether to change the word in official publications to trichloromonfluoromethane.

Plane Hi-jacked To Cuba

MIAMI, Fla. (AP)-Two men armed with shotguns and revolvers shot and wounded a pilot and an airline mechanic Tuesday and hijacked a two-engine seaplane to Cuba.

They forced the copilot to take off following an exchange of gunfire with policemen on the ground.

Five passengers who had boarded the Chalk International Airline plane for its scheduled flight to Bimini, in the Bahamas, were aboard the craft, flown by copilot Bob Wallis.

A sixth passenger jumped off and sounded the alarm.

The hijackers shot pilot James Cothron, 49, and Douglas MacKenzie, 48, an electrical engineer, in commandeering the craft at the airline's island station, between Miami and Miami Beach.

States Urged To Assume School Finance Burden

WASHINGTON (AP)-A presidential commission urged today that the states assume the prime burden for financing public schools and said much less reliance should be placed on local property taxes for this purpose.

The Commission on School Finance, appointed by President Nixon two years ago, also recommended the federal government distribute incentive grants that would reimburse the states for part of the cost of financing elementary and secondary education.

The report was issued as Nixon met with top domestic advisers to discuss how the administration will fight forced busing of school children.

Deputy press secretary Neal Ball said the chief executive called the meeting to discuss "a variety of views and options" on busing.

The Commission, which envisions a five-year program of federal grants to ease transition to full state financing, said it was its "best judgment that between $4 billion and $5 billion will be required to provide incentives..."

In an appendix, the commission said it did not think it appropriate "to offer recommendations affecting national tax policy including, among other things, new revenue sources such as the value-added tax."

The report itself did not mention such a possibility. The commission was headed by industrialist Neil McElroy, who was secretary of Defense in the Dwight D. Eisenhower administration.

The panel said the nation's education system is "in serious trouble, and if we fail to recognize it, our country's chance to survive will all but disappear."

In a 147-page final report submitted to Nixon yesterday, the panel noted that localities spend nearly half their tax revenues or education and that 80 per cent of all local education outlays are financed through the property tax.

"The traditional means for producing the bulk of school money-local property taxation-has become inadequate to do the job," it said.

Should the states assume the major part of the burden, it suggested many of them would have to increase state sales and income taxes-with the federal government providing supplemental funds through incentive grants and through various forms of the Nixon administration's proposals for sharing federal revenues with state and local governments.

NIBBLER--Richard G. Kleindienst, acting attorney general whose nomination to fill that post is before the Senate, appears before a second day of hearings into his role in the Justice Department's settlement of an antitrust suit involving a merger of International Telephone & Telegraph Corp. Kleindienst told the Senate Judiciary Committee he had no knowledge of an ITT subsidiary pledge for funds for the Republican convention. (AP)

Commission Explores Kleindienst's ITT Role

WASHINGTON (AP) — An attorney for International Telephone & Telegraph Corp. was quoted Tuesday as predicting the Supreme Court probably would agree to break up the conglomerate unless the Justice Department backed off from an antitrust suit last spring.

A letter from Lawrence E. Walsh, an outside legal consultant to ITT, was released at a Senate Judiciary Committee hearing reconsidering the nomination of Richard G. Kleindienst to be attorney general.

The letter and accompanying memo arguing the economic damage which would result from a strong antitrust judgment against ITT were cited by Kleindienst as the principal reason why the government postponed filing its case with the high court.

Instead, an out-of-court settlement was reached which allowed ITT to hang on to the Hartford Fire Insurance Co., an agreement columnist Jack Anderson says is linked to a $400,000 commitment by ITT to the 1972 Republican National Convention in San Diego.

"Looking back at the results of government antitrust cases in the Supreme Court," Walsh wrote Kleindienst last April 16, "one must realize that if the government urges an expanded interpretation of the vague language of the Clayton antitrust Act, there is a high probability it will succeed."

As the committee continued to explore Kleindienst's role in the case, there were these other developments:

—Contrary to his testimony last week, former antitrust chief Richard McLaren said he went through a White House aide to obtain the services of an investment banker as an adviser in the ITT case.

Last week, McLaren, now a federal judge in Chicago, denied he consulted with White House aide Peter Flanigan in selecting Richard J. Ramsden, to join lawyers and economists who eventually worked out the ITT agreement.

Acknowledging a study Ramsden did on the economic impact of the ITT case, McLaren said his memory, until refreshed, was hazy on whether he talked to Flanigan.

"It now appears there was some consultation," McLaren said though describing Flanigan as "simply a conduit for my request to secure Ramsden."

McLaren said economists within the Justice Department were not consulted either because of a lack of expertise or to keep those knowledgeable about the case to a small number.

—At the start of the afternoon session, Kleindienst told Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., that he would not turn over to the committee the complete file of the ITT settlement case. He said the file contained certain material which, if made public, could possibly cause harm to third persons and is of a confidential nature.

Supreme Court To Decide Government Secrecy Power

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court agreed today to rule on the government's power to classify its documents as secret.

The test case, accepted for review next term, concerns nine reports and letters prepared for President Nixon on the Cannikin underground nuclear test.

Last October, Judges Harold Leventhal and Charles Fahy of the U.S. Circuit Court here cleared the way for the possible public release of some of the documents.

At issue is the government policy of classifying all documents in a particular file as "secret" or "top secret" if one of them contains material considered sensitive.

In other actions today, the court:

—Refused 7 to 2 to pass on whether the Vietnam war is constitutional. The majority has so held in half a dozen prior cases since 1967.

—Prevented thousands of prisoners, convicted before 1970, from challenging their convictions on grounds they had no lawyer at their preliminary hearing.

—Set the state for an early ruling on the allocation of natural gas supplies to homeowners during periods of shortages.

—Cleared the way for a ruling this term on whether a federal grand jury may question aides of Sen. Mike Gravel, D-Alaska, about publication of the Pentagon Papers.

Ruling in a suit brought by Rep. Patsy T. Mink, D-Hawaii, and 32 other members of Congress. Leventhal and Fahy ordered U.S. District Court Judge George Hart, Jr., to examine the Cannikin papers and determine which of them "are separable from the secret remainder."

The Justice Department said in appealing that this "judicial inquiry into matters which are peculiarly within the province of the executive" is inconsistent with provisions of the Freedom of Information Act of 1970.

That law generally makes government records available to the public, but has several exceptions, including material the executive branch finds should be kept secret "in the interest of the national defense or foreign policy."

Federal Inmate Policy Changed

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Federal Bureau of Prisons has quietly changed its policy on prisoner contacts with the news media and says it now permits convicts to send uncensored letters to newsmen.

In a three-page directive, Bureau Director Norman A. Carlson said letters to newsmen are to be forwarded "directly, promptly, sealed and without inspection."

"Incoming correspondence from the news media," Carlson added, "will be inspected solely for contraband, or for content which would incite conduct which is illegal."

The new policy went into effect Feb. 11. A bureau spokesman said no general announcement was made, but added "we've made the statement available to anyone who has asked."

The spokesman said informing prisoners of their new right has been left up to the wardens of the separate federal prisons.

The new policy statement says newsmen will not be permitted to interview inmates.

But it says newsmen are encouraged to visit federal prisons to report on conditions and "conversation may be permitted with inmates whose identity is not to be made public if it is limited to the discussion of institutional facilities, programs and activities."

Previously, federal prisoners have been allowed to send uncensored letters to "officials such as congressmen, judges and other government officials."

The bureau spokesman said sealed correspondence with lawyers up to now has been prohibited, but that this policy, too, will be changed soon.

He said prisoners will be permitted to send uncensored letters to their attorneys of record and that return mail will be inspected only for contraband.

The spokesman said three suits have been filed by prisoners seeking freer contact with newsmen, but that the change in policy resulted from a routine review and not from the legal action.

Mental Health Column

Investigating Your Head

Editor's note: This mental health column will be a regular feature in the Collegian. It will appear every Wednesday.

By DRS. McCASHIN AND KLEIN

Q: "I'm really worried, recently I've been having some strange experiences. When I go to sleep my eyelids flutter or I see vivid images in my mind. Also the other night when I was with some people I felt funny chills, saw lights flashing and felt intoxicated after only one beer. I've done some acid but I haven't had any in over four months. These experiences leave me feeling upset. Sometimes I think I'm going crazy."

A: The experiences you mention can be pretty frightening. They resemble some of the many perceptual, sensory and bodily "flash back" reactions that have been associated with LSD use. These experiences can run from mild to severe and depend on one's personality and the amount of external stress that a person has to cope with at any given time. Some people suggest that the quality of the "trip", whether it was good or bad, also influences flashback phenomena. Using other psychotropic drugs such as alcohol or marijuana can precipitate LSD-like episodes. These reactions can occur repeatedly up to two years following the discontinuance of LSD ingestion. Many people report that the reactins disappear within a year or less. LSD has the ability to "amplify" one's experience, be it good or bad. This can occur in flashbacks as well. A person's discomfort with himself or a situation, which would ordinarily cause an unpleasant negative experience, can be heightened in the form of an LSD FLASHBACK. These reactions do not mean a person is "crazy", but if they interfere with your sense of well being you might want to seek professional evaluation or drug counseling.

Q "My father is an alcoholoic. Although he has over the years had brief unproductive relationships with doctors, psychiatrists and Alcoholics Anonymous, he generally denies his drinking is a problem, or blames things on the family (especially my mother). I find it more and more intolerable to be with him. He disgusts me but he is my father–what can I do to help him?"

A: Probably the most difficult part of living with an alcoholic parent is coming to grip with the reality of one's helplessness in the situation. Ultimately, only the alcoholic himself can make the decision to change and therefore become accessible to the help of his family, of professionals, and of self-help groups like A.A. The sense of disgust you feel is a rational one and does not suggest that you do not love your father, nor that you are being disloyal to him. It might well be helpful to let your father know that you are willing and eager to relate to him but only when he is reasonably sober and to back up that statement with action. This might be the motivation he needs to drink less often and less heavily as well as making things more tolerable for you.

Drs. McCashin and Klein will accept questions in strict confidence for possible appearance in "Your Head". Send or bring your inquiries to Mental Health, 303 Machmer Hall.

Racism Study At Smith

As part of the School of Education, University of Massachusetts effort to combat institutional racism, the students of the Asian American Identity course are presenting a display at Smith College of photographs, posters and other material depicting the historical and contemporary experience of Asians in America. The exhibit is entitled, "Asian Perspective on American Racism," and it consists of numerous photographs mounted on sculptured cubicles that recount the World War II experiences of 110,000 Japanese Americans in U.S. concentration camps. The display is located in the lobby of Wright Hall, Smith College. The exhibit will be on display from March 6th through the 16th.

Tuition Hike Debated

higher education for all. It is my belief that tuition for in-state students should remain at its present level.

"I feel that the proposed legislation is based on misconceptions about the conditions at the University of Massachusetts, the financial base of its students, and the ability of these bills to accomplish their goal; to provide equal opportunity for higher education to all the citizens of the Commonwealth.

"...Deep financial sacrifices are undertaken by both students and parents to afford the high cost of higher education at state-supported schools. Financial aid is highly inadequate. Although almost 72% of the undergraduates of UMass-Amherst applied for scholarships in 1969-70, only 9% were granted any aid. Presently, over $4.3 million would be required to equal the amount of need in the entire student body of UMass. Fully 76% of the undergraduates of UMass-Boston work while attending school. A survery of the parents of the class of 1973 at UMass-Amherst has shown:

a.) 39% planned to go into debt to finance their children's education.

b.) 35% of the mothers planned to get a job for the first time.

c.) 21% of the fathers hoped for a "moonlighting" job.

The cost of an education at the University of Massachusetts is high and great...

"...The University of Massachusetts and the other state colleges were founded on a principle of low tuition. The public colleges and universities serve to assure access to higher education to those unable to afford private education's high cost. Any increase in tuition will eliminate a larger proportion of the public from a college education because of expenses."

The members of the Joint Committee on Education (Reps. McColgan, Dwyer, Gannett, Matrango, Daly, Boverini, Young, Senator Fonseca) while they generally remained aloof from making specific statements for or against tuition increases, seemed to carefully consider the many arguments against raising tuition for in-state students.

The subject of increased tuition for out of state students is a different story altogether, and there is a far greater likelihood that out of staters will be hit with a considerable tuition increase.

From today's open hearing, all tuition increase bills will go to closed sessions of the Joint Committee on Education. The Committee can either report favorably, unfavorably, or not at all on the various tuition bills. The committee will also have to study the tuition recommendations of Governor Sargent, which are not fully known at this time.

Any final decision on tuition must come cooperatively from the Governor's Office, the State Legislature, and the Board of Trustees.

The Cooperative Extension Service mobile unit will be on campus Thursday, March 9 and Friday, March 10. The mobile unit incorporates a variety of educational media for teaching nutrituin to inner-city families in the Commonwealth. The campus community is invited to visit the mobile unit at the following locations: Thursday, March 9, 9:30 a.m.-5 p.m. Lot 5 between Curry Hicks and Munson Hall. Friday, March 10, 9:30 a.m.-5 p.m. In front of Holdsworth Hall. J.R. Beattie, 5-2715.

Vermont Court Voids Parochial School Funding

BURLINGTON, Vt. (AP)-A panel of Vermont federal judges has ruled unconstitutional the state's 11-month-old parolchial school aid law, leaving in confusion at least eight towns operating under the law.

Senior Judge Sterry Watterman, formerly active on the U.S. Second Circuit Court of Appeals, said the statute was "violative of constitutional limitations."

Judge Waterman wrote the opinion for the three-judge panel that heard arguments on Dec. 28, 1971. The other judges were Bernard J. Leddy, of the U.S. District Court, and James L. Oakes, of the Court of Appeals.

Judge Leddy died Jan. 9 before the opinion was written, but Judge Waterman said he agreed with the decision and as much of Judge Leddy's thinking as possible was included in the opinion.

The court said "the Vermont act will thrust the state not only directly into the physical plants of the parochial schools, but also into their operation and control. As such, it truly involves excessive entanglement between government and religion."

The Vermont parochial aid law, passed in early April of last year, allowed local districts to provide teachers and supplies to church-related schools and then collect 50 per cent reimbursement from the state.

The teachers were hired by the public school district, were under the control of the district's superintendent but worked in the parochial school.

"On its' face," Judge Waterman wrote, "the statute will create within the established hierarchy of the parochial school administration a unit of teachers whose loyalties do not run to the school administration, but rather to the superintendent of the public schools."

He said, "through the state control of teachers in the church schools, government control would become entangled with the existing religious control, and the day-to-day instructional administration would of necessity be the result of close cooperation between the school's administration and the public school administration."

Judge Waterman said the law also provided for a similar entanglement of the church in the political process, especially in the choice of teachers and allocations to the church school.

It Adds Up To Power

UMass exists and is alive and living, if not so well in Amherst, so Governor Sargent and Attorney General Quinn have discovered in the last five days. For too many years, the only forum for government officials to speak were located in Eastern Massachusetts. Hopefully, Sargent, Quinn, and other state officials will come to UMass often to discuss our future, and the other issues of the day. Not only are we an important constituency politically, but we are the eventual source of answers to the state's problems. We, as students must continually let these men know that long gone are the days of Mass Aggie.!

Let us not be naive about the potential power students at this University possess. The Governor and Attorney General can add very well. Twenty thousand students, forty thousand parents, two thousand faculty and staff, and an equal number of wives and or husbands, all adds up to POWER. It would be nice to have everyone write a letter to their state representative and senator, but by showing Governor Sargent a packed Student Union Ballroom last night, and pressing him on issues like Belchertown, UMass, and the environment, he knows we mean business, that we must be heard, and that we must be reckoned with in the future. If the Governor will not change his budget request this year for UMass and Belchertown, he will have to increase the money and priority in next year's budget.

Anyway, He Sounded Good

Perhaps the one thing the Governor's visit here proved was that we still can't beat a politician at his own game.

It all sounded so nice. A halt to the Montague dump pending full public study; a promise not only to look into the situation at the Belchertown State School but to visit there within a month; his quote that the University budget was increased seven and one-half million overall and that the teaching ratio, despite Whitmore's cries to the contrary will stay below the 15 to 1 ratio.

Most of us up here are unable to cope with promises and quotes like that beyond expressions of emotional rage. The Governor knows what's going on better than any of us will ever. True, he was in some tight spots along the way when being pressured for concrete figures and promises, but you don't forget the applause at the end. Humphrey didn't get that.

However, there were holes in his speech, some obvious, other not so.

Yes, the University budget was increased by the seven and a half million amount, but over a million of seven went to heating. (Doesn't improve education very much does it?) Other portions of it went to increased costs in services and supplies, some went to cover the results of inflation in existing University services and programs. Little or none went to education. But it sounded nice.

The teacher-student ratio is much the same the Governor figures that we now have a 13-1 student-teacher ratio. Whitmore says it's at 15-1, and next year will go higher. Well, if the Governor figured in all faculty his figure is no doubt correct. But all the faculty up here aren't teaching. Some are doing research, some are on sabbatical, others are simply sick. All of which cuts down the number of faculty, actually sitting in front of classes.

Whitmore's figure of 15-1 is probably based on the number of teaching faculty, the number that counts. If a teacher isn't teaching playing with figures doesn't put him in a classroom.

Belchertown was the stickiest part of the evening for the Governor. His reasoning behind not appropriating more funds for positions there (that the number of patients was being reduced) fell flat in it's face with the reply shouted from the crowd, "How, starve them?" that referred back to an earlier question pointing out to Sargent that food funds had been cut $200,000 from last years figure. That he promised to look into, a standard reply meaning little.

The question about cuts in the Belchertown intern program (Boltwood) got him, but not through direct fault of his own. The Boltwood budget was cut by Whitmore in it's effort to scrounge money for faculty positions denied by the Governor for fiscal '73. That blame can be spread around some.

Montague dump and Sargent's other environmental programs announced last night have higher degree of credibility. He has been involved in ecology long before the word was ever coined. An early member of the Sierra Club, he has done more to preserve the state's resources than any politicians in state government, past or present. His pushing for a ban on high sulfur-content fuel oil his attitude towards industrial pollutors and his attempts to have gas tax money used for mass transit are stands most politicians only talk about; few take the political risks inherent in fish hag industry.

The Governor won't do all he can or could, for the environment. We can't forget that he is a politician. But perhaps his plea for student involvement last night was more than political rhetoric. If public pressure is put on pollutors it can achieve results that the politicians can't (won't) because they are politicians, and business is where the campaign money flows from.

The Governor made alot of promises last night. Whether or not he keeps them will be good standard to measure him by. But the necessity to have those promises carried out is too important to be left to the Governor's good faith alone. If things don't start happening soon it will be all our jobs to see that they do.

A Look At Hikes

In past years, tuition increase bills usually dealt with flat, across-the-board hikes. Arguments against these were that even a slight increase in tuition would result in a large number of students being forced to drop out of school.

Many of the bills taken up at the Education Committee hearing at the State House in Boston yesterday approach tuition from a different angle.

Realizing that new taxes would be very unwelcome to their constituents, members of the General Court have devised new ways to help fill the Commonwealth's coffers.

Coming in some form of increased income from students attending state colleges and universities, tuition bills this year have built-in guilty complexes.

One exception is the bill filed by James J. Craven, Jr. of Boston. House #1510 provides "no tuition charge will be made to any student who is a resident of the Commonwealth at any state college including the University of Massachusetts." The students' feelings probably move with this bill more than any other. One local UMass administrator has been known to favor this, also.

The free tuition dream ends when one realizes that this will never become a reality within the next few years in Massachusetts.

Assuming that all students could be convinced of the correctness that $200 per year per student is not enough to pay for higher education, Governor Francis W. Sargent has filed a bill which would increase the out-of-state tuition rate while creating financial aid assistance for in-state students.

In other bills filed, in-state students would be charged according to their family income. It would be most likely that students who had declared financial independence from their parents could base these costs on their own income.

The House Minority Leader's office has also entered one bill, which it will revise over the next one or two weeks. In its ideal, it would end up that Massachusetts residents may have their tuition, room, and board deferred at any public or private college or university by the state government. Repayment, with no interest, would not begin until the student started earning $7500 per year. This bill also would increase charges for public education to 40-60 per cent of the total instructional costs of the state.

The first reaction to this bill is how would the state keep tabs on all the graduates and how would it enforce payment by those who move out of state? Spokesmen for the bill say that an insurance policy would cover the defaulters. As it was filed with the House, this bill contains many restrictions. The revision may do away with them.

A bill which carries the endorsement of the Massachusetts State Employees Association calls for free tuition for the state employees children attending state colleges or universities.

What appears to be an attempt to stifle protest over tuition hikes is one bill which would require the hikes to start with next year's incoming Freshmen. The defense for plans like these is that students here now have always felt that the costs would be whatever they now are each year. The new Freshmen could just come expecting to pay higher amounts, not ever missing the lower rates.

By the way, in case you are wondering what the estimated costs per year of attending UMass-Amherst, President Robert C. Wood gave these figures at the hearing: $1,747, including tuition, fees and room and board. "If the tuition is increased only $100, it would be 10th--the 10th most expensive public university in the entire country," he said.

Soon the Legislators will make their choice of which, if any, bills should be accepted. They will probably hear many more times opposing arguments on the tuition issue: "Students should carry more of their share of the costs of higher education." "The state should continue to provide a high quality, low cost education." "Students from high income brackets keep students from low income brackets out when they attend public school, therefore the higher income student should pay more than the lower income student, allowing both to attend." "Higher education is a benefit to the society as a whole and therefore should become free to all who want it."

Let your Legislator know what you think.

Letters To The Editor

Leaven For Institutional Change

To the Editor:

On February 14 of this year the Department of Health, Education & Welfare informed Columbia University that it was withholding $13.3 million in federal contracts because the schools "affirmative action plan" had failed to meet legal requirements for equal employment opportunity. The Department's Office of Civil Rights has initiated formal proceedings that could terminate all federal contracts with Columbia and bar it from future contracts. Seven other universities have been warned of similar actions including Harvard, Cornell and the University of Michigan.

The action was initiated under a longstanding executive order prohibiting discrimination because of race, color, sex, religion or national origin in the employment practices of any business or institution holding a federal contract. It is administered by the Department of Labor but HEW was instructed to monitor the employment practices of educational institutions. HEW has required all such institutions to file with the Department "affirmative action plans" containing complete statistical information needed to determine whether discrimination exists.

In compliance with the order President Wood has initiated a University Affirmative Action Program which would increase "efforts" to assure equal opportunity for all members of the University community." He has asked the administrations of the three campuses to "make the development of an affirmative action plan a top priority for accomplishment and implementation."

President Wood has also noted that the President's Working Group on University Counselling, Advisory, and Support Services has made several significant suggestions during the course of its work. The Working Group, or Gage Committee, has, during the past several months submitted draft reports containing evaluations of the University's present situation and recommendations for an effective plan to eliminate institutional racism in the University. A fundamental principle underlying the Gage Committee's report is that by improving and placing special emphasis on counselling and other support services for minority students, it will insure that resources necessary for the advancement of services for the entire student body will be realized.

The Gage Committee, aware of the "stark reality of serious social problems" has attempted to create a role for the University in the solution of these problems by making recommendations in the following areas: 1) recruitment and admission of more minority students; 2) a complementary financial aid program to allow this goal to be realized; 3) a meaningful and effective career planning service; 4) improved academic advising with concentration on the student's perspective; this includes a "Drop-Out" center for students who may find their present educational experience unrewarding, which would aid them in determining alternative goals; 5) boosted recruitment of minority staff in residential areas; 6) expansion of and increased support for the CCEBS program; 7) shift in program emphasis and philosophy in the Mental Health Service from crisis intervention to a community based preventive health model.

While these proposals have been set forth for the Amherst campus, UM/Boston has been unable to produce specific program objectives because of a "critical gap in communication and credibility between administration and minority staff and students". Chancellor Broderick, while expressing a desire to bring in an outside consultant to scrutinize the Boston situation, has also expressed misgivings with the Gage Committee's placing so much emphasis on minority needs while seemingly ignoring the needs of other students.Mr. Broderick seems to have misused the fundamental objective of the report which was best articulated by Prof. Acklyn Lynch of the Afro-Am Department, "...minorities (can) provide the leaven for institutional change."

"Food Coach"

To the Editor:

The article of March 6th concerning Mr. Warren blew my mind! I could hardly believe this man has undergone such a drastic change of attitude since I had the privilege to converse with him in October. I surely must meet with him again; the extent of his psychical transformation seems to be of momentus proportions. Why, only a few months ago he answered my desperate plea for a Commons exemption with the statement, "Listen there are a lot of people higher than me who make the rules." As you mentioned, though (and I am not one to disagree), comments such as these reveal his willingness and cheerfulness in dealing with students, and indeed, a truly sympathetic ear. Yes, we need more people like "Food Coach" in high places at UMass--an institution where individual's rights are often inhibited by impersonal, bureaucratic channels. It is my contention that without men like Mr. Warren fascist organizations like the Dining Commons might collapse, an occurrence which would undoubtedly throw UMass into a state of unbridled chaos, the likes of which this university has not seen since the Humphrey travesty.

In closing, may I add simply that it is only right and just that exceptions to our free enterprise system, a typical institutions, i.e., those with a real interest in how their subjects feel, men of courage willing to question authority, and implementation of different political methods, in this case fascism, be embodied here at the university in the Dining Commons and their concerned spokesman-Mr. Warren.

Human Decency?

To the Editor:

Punitive, specific, and repressive action is too commonly the proposed solution to situations disliked. Specifically the new penalty for University shoplifting and the reaction to the establishment of a term paper service in this area exemplify this approach.

Admittedly an estimated $50,000.00 shoplifting loss is unacceptable. But the disruption of a student's academic career is hardly a suitable response. Though I hesitate to propose the establishment of a committee, such an action seems to be in order. Interview shoplifters: who and why. Clearly, however, the present measures are an affront to simple human decency.

Another clear example of repressive style is the ranting and raving over the violation of 'academic ideals and integrity' as shown by the statements of various administrators, here and elsewhere, a pending Student Senate bill condemning the sale of research papers, and a Collegian editorial (3/7/72), though the polemical character of the last was so severe as to question the serious intent of its author. First, I contend, the entire notion of academic ideals or integrity is spurious. An ideal is a denial of what is; it perpetuates mystification. Better to look at the situation and discover why there is a profitable market for peddled papers at outrageous prices. Second, I doubt the grevious nature of this matter. Learning is an individual endeavor. The loss, if any, is to the student who purchases the paper. Further the seriousness of this matter is rendered questionable by the language of moral outrage: suitable perhaps to excite emotion (read fear and trembling) but hardly consonant with reasonable inquiry. Third, the matter must be viewed in its total context. Professors who do not know their students, and often seem not to care; professors who lack imagination and excitement to teach interesting courses promote these activities. One hardly need cite huge class sizes as a contributing factor. I suggest acquired term papers are possible only in this context. Fourth, the amount of energy expended on this matter serves only to obscure the real violations of individual integrity that are a commonplace at this university. Discord and dislike within and without the constituencies of this campus-students, staff, faculty, administration--are symptomatic of a more basic rot.

Perhaps our criticisms and actions might be better focused, but then again these other matters are less suitable for unsustainable outbursts.

It's A Common Goal

To the Editor:

I would like to write in reference to the J. Harrington et al letter in Tuesday's March 7 Collegian.

First of all you seem to be overly anxious about as you put it "a dangerous precedent" and a "misappropriation of funds". Your letter unfortunately was a bit premature on this point. We fully realize the legal hassles involved had we planned on donating student money to an outside legal defense fund. At Monday night's meeting we talked about and accepted the compromise proposal to give only $2000 to us for operating expenses (which we qualify for as an RSO group) and use only donations to support the legal case.

It has been stated many times in letters to the Collegian why the case is going to involve enormous expenses. The Belchertown Friends is a small organization with limited funds. They are fighting the state, which has unlimited resources. We can't possibly win unless we can afford to fight them at their level.

The Mass. Civil Liberties Union has refused to deal with the case.

Most important I would like to address myself to your final point. You stated that the state "should be given the chance to begin to remedy their own problems". How long do we have to wait? A State Legislative Commission in 1968 stated that the conditions in Belchertown were degrading and inhumane. They stated proposals that needed be dealt with. What has happened since then? The place is still unbearable and unfit for human habitation. Everything else has failed. That is why we're trying what we feel to be the last resort. We do have a strong chance of succeeding. We are getting very active student and community support. If you feel that we are mischanneling our efforts, then please help us. We are very open to suggestions.

We are all working for the same thing. We in SOS feel that we are doing the right thing.

Up The Infirmary

On the subject of women and their bodies and internal exams, etc., THE INFIRMARY SUCKS. Thousands of women are processed through there every week and the great majority of them leave with the same ignorance and fear that have kept women quiet and oppressed for all of HIStory.

The routine vaginal exam runs something like this: The doctor (always male) takes down a brief record of "why you're here". He leaves, so that the nurse can come in and ask you to take your pants off, wasting ridiculous amounts of their godknowsprecioustime. As soon as you are on the table, the nurse insists on putting a sheet over your "EXPOSED" lower half. The standard irrationale is "modesty"...WHOSE?? The doctor proceeds to stick his finger, three instruments, and a light up your hole; what is he missing out on?? And surely women have seen their own pubic hair before!!

The only sad result of such medieval attitudes is the continued ignorance and fear of women concerning their own bodies. It's impossible to see what the fuck he's doing!!

The same attitude prevails over "ASKING QUESTIONS". It is greatly discouraged. It takes too much time. (The same amount of time it took for him to leave the room while you took off your pants.) What physicians seem to misunderstand is that if women were informed to begin with, of the whys and wherefores of vaginal-reproductive functions, they would be coming less often to the infirmary for "no good reason" or could be treating themselves for vaginitis.

Or are male scientists insecure about answering questions, because they know so little. They can set up incredibly sensitive technology to send people to the moon and destroy countries by radar, but no one seems to know or care very much about researching women's bodies. No one seems to know where vaginal infections come from or how to prevent them. No one yet knows how the I.U.D. works. There is still no painless, cheap, safe, or 100% effective birth control method. There are only dangerous, and potentially lethal, methods of aborting unwanted fetuses.

WOMEN OF UMASS., refuse the sheet-shameful-attitude of our infirmary. Don't leave until all your questions are answered. Refuse to sit through moral lecturing. (One doctor handed me a set of pamphlets which included "why girls should wait" and "how to keep your figure and personality well-groomed to catch a guy"-I had asked him for the names of books I could read for an in-depth description of my insides-hormonal balance, infections, side-effects, etc., etc.)

MAKE YOUR GRIEVANCES WELL-HEARD!!!

Suggestion: go with a friend who's having an internal. Get to see-feel what your insides are like.

Landing Good Land

By GILBERT J. SALK

Spring is getting close, believe it or not, and with it come thoughts of land, plants, building, growing. Some of you will be graduating, some splitting. And a few might just decide that it's time to try something new. A farm, perhaps, or a commune, or just a cabin in the woods. But, inevitably, the question: Where's the land, and for how much?

Now that you're into the topic (assuming you haven't thrown your copy of the paper away) let's talk some about locating good land.

The first problem is figuring out exactly what you're looking for. There's a big difference between land which is suitable for subsistence farming and that which can provide a paying crop. You should make a careful assessment of your need for other people, either as neighbors or as suppliers of helpful hints and necessities. How near to a city do you want to be? What do you plan to do to keep yourself alive? If kids are involved, what about the availability of a doctor or hospital? Will you be sending the kid to the local school? I'm sure you can think of other questions. The important ones involve having a clear idea of what you hope to do, what skills you have at hand and what skills are lacking, what your needs will be, and how you hope to relate to the local folks.

Once you get your head straight about all that, you can start your search. Obviously, you're not limited to this country, but my information is, so I'll talk about searching within the U.S.

There are two large national real estate agencies which have local representatives all around the country. Each comes out with a huge catalog of land, farms, homes, stores, camps, and so on at least twice a year. This catalog lists everything from huge acreages costing over a million dollars to small lots costing less than a thousand dollars. Given the range offered, you are sure to be able to find the amount of land (and buildings) you want for a reasonable price, and there are some real bargains.

If you want to get on the mailing list (FREE!), just send a card to United Farm Agency, 612 W. 47th St., Kansas City, Mo. 64112, and ask for their catalog. Do the same with Strout Realty, 521 E. Green St., Pasadena, Cal. 91101.

Thes two catalogs will give you a fair idea of land costs in any area you think might be suited to your needs. You should know that most of the listings are sent into the central office months before the catalog is printed and mailed, so most of what you see has been sold already. But it does give you some working idea of what's real.

As a push for buying your own land, let me share some of the good things about the place we bought in Conway. There's the birdfeeders, for a start. I've really started to groove on birds, and have seen some this year that I've never seen before. There's the planning that goes into starting an organic garden this spring, learning to compost, reading about mulching and natural control of insects. There's looking out the back windows and seeing only trees and hills. There's the drive home from campus on Rt. 116 every day between steep hills and along a clear, cold, snow-covered stream. There's the post office where the postmaster knows all about everyone and everything that goes on in town so you don't need a newspaper and you don't feel as if your privacy is being invaded. There's learning to find and use new information. Try it. It's fun.

I want to share some access with you in the form of a few books related to land and building, but first let me ask for some help and report on the CULTURNATIVES Clearinghouse idea. So far, only two people have indicated a willingness to work to put a clearinghouse together. That's not enough. There's work to be done if the thing is going to happen, so if you thought the idea was good, please get your name to me.

Now, the appeal for help. I'm an amateur photographer, and I've been taking a lot of pictures lately, including some nudes. But now I need a moderately insane woman (or two women with similar builds) who would be willing to model nude outdoors in the snow. There's no way I can make it worth your while, but I can offer you copies of the pictures and a couple of enlargements. Somebody, please?

If you're into either the clearinghouse or the modeling, please contact me in 923 CC or call 545-0813 days. And now, on to the books.

Let's assume for the moment that you've got your land, and you're ready to start working. You're out in the woods, and you want to build a log cabin. Check out The Wilderness Cabin by Calvin Rutstrum ($5.95, Macmillan Co., NYC). Rutstrum has built several log cabins himself, and shares his learnings in a clear, interesting manner. He is obviously a man who appreciates nature and craftsmanship, and he is anxious to communicate his feelings and his skills. If you're on a back-to-the-woods trip, this book should help.

If you're into communes or intentional communities of any kind, and planning to build from scratch, you might find it helpful to see how some small communities have evolved on a natural-selection basis, if only to give you some jumping-off points for planning your own village. Douglas Fraser's Village Planning in the Primitive World ($2.95, George Braziller, Inc., NYC) describes several primitive villages, including Mbuti pygmies, Cheyenne Indians, Trobriand Islanders, and others. Most are illustrated with photos and line drawings, and the functions of building design and relationships to each other is described. If you're building your own community, or just interested in architecture as a social art, you might be interested in this book.

No matter what you build, you will need materials, and they usually cost money. It can help greatly if you can estimate well ahead of time what you will need, and about how much it will cost. An excellent aid, Simplified Carpentry Estimating by J. Douglas Wilson and Clell M. Rogers ($5.95, Simmons-Boardman Publ. Corp., NYC) tells you how to figure what you're going to need to do almost any kind of building. It includes foundations, framing, finishing, and hardware. There's all kinds of charts helping you determine how much material you'll need to finish a job, and explanatory stuff to help you use the charts.

Once you've got the lumber together, of course, you'll need tools and the knowledge to get the best out of your tools. Leo McDonnell's The Use of Hand Woodworking Tools (Delmar Publ., Inc., Albany, N.Y.) is an excellent book on the care, use and feeding of your hand tools. If you care about the things helping you do your work, you'll want to treat them right. That means using them only for the right kinds of jobs, keeping them sharp, or balanced, or whatever, and storing them properly. This book will tell you how.

PEACE.

Elks Receive SelectmanOK

MIDDLEBORO, Mass. (AP) — Selectmen have certified the Elks lodge as eligible for a beano license despite an attempt to delay action on the matter.

Selectmen voted the certification Monday night.

The Rev. William M. MacKenzie, secretary-treasurer of a committee to integrate the Elks and a member of the lodge, said the club bars non-whites from membership and did not deserve certification.

"You sit in judgment of an issue that affects the common good of this town," Father MacKenzie, a Roman Catholic priest, told the selectmen.

He said the Elks should not be allowed to profit from beano until they permit non-white members.

DVP Presents Pituitary Researcher

The great anatomist Vesalius (1514-64) believed that the pituitary gland, a pea-sized body located at the base of the brain and weighing only one-sixteenth of an ounce, was an organ for the secretion of waste material. Today, the pituitary, one of the smallest of man's hormone producers, is know to be the master gland, because most of the hormones it secretes tell other hormone-producing glands what to do. So, in a sense, it is the director of the body's entire chemical factory.

Because of this, the Distinguished Visitors Program has invited Dr. Choh Hao Li, head of the Hormone Research Laboratory, University of California Medical School at San Francisco, to speak on "Pituitary Hormones, Growth and Reproduction." Dr. Li has studied the pituitary gland for over thirty years. He has discovered and purified six of the seven known hormones secreted by the anterior love of the pituitary (the seventh having been isolated by a scientist who was once a student of Dr. Li.) He found the chemical sequence of ACTH, useful for the treatment of arthritis, and he found and synthesized the HGH (human growth hormone), a compound of 188 amino acides, one of the largest synthesized molecules to date, and of immense medical application.

Dr. C.H. Li's lecture "Pituitary Hormones, Growth and Reproduction" will be held at 8:15, Thursday, March 16, in the Mahar Auditorium. Everyone who is interested in knowing about his/her own bodily functions in general, and the endocrine system in particular, is welcome. And informal coffee hour will be held in the Colonial Lounge of the Student Union immediately after the lecture. There will also be a Biochemistry Seminar, led by Dr. Li, entitled "The HGH Molecule," at 4:30 that afternoon in Peters Auditorium of Goessman Laboratory.

Patricia Bonner-Lyons

Ms. Lyons To Speak On Politics Of Women

Tonight, International Women's Day, Patricia Bonner-Lyons will speak on "New Politics: the Role of Women and Youth."

She is well known in Massachusetts as a young militant who recently ran for election to the Boston School Committee and drew 53,000 votes; the closest any black person has yet come to being elected to that committee. She ran as a member of the Young Workers Liberation League, on a platform of community control of the schools. In January, she was a delegate for Shirley Chisholm at the Massachusetts Coalition. She recently sponsored a bill with Royal Bolling in the Massachusetts House for community control of the schools. Her talk is being co-sponsored by women in the Economy and Political System and the Women's Caucus of the School of Ed.

Ms. Bonner-Lyons is a Boston hospital worker and mother of one child.

Ms. Bonner-Lyons speech is part of a program on International Women's Day, which includes a march from the common to the University Student Union at 11 a.m., and a rally in the Student Union from 12 to 3 p.m. She will speak at 8 p.m. in the Engineering East Auditorium.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

by SYDNEY OMARR

Pisces persons require a certain amount of seclusion. A quiet, calm place enables natives of this zodiacal sign to discover themselves. Pisces women have "fascinating eyes." Pisces men often complain about "aching feet." Pisces harmonizes with Capricorn, Taurus, Cancer and Scorpio. There is strong attraction to Virgo, but caution should be exercised in relationships with Gemini and Sagittarius. Some famous Pisceans include Jackie Gleason, Lawrence Durrell and Elizabeth Taylor.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Deal with those who exercise quiet authority. Means steer clear of those who talk much, do little. Accent is on long-range goal. Catch up on correspondence. Write and communicate. Expand views and ambitions.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Be perceptive. Reject superficial explanations. Dig deep for information. Friend could help you obtain your fair share of money dispute. Check legal document. Ask to see for yourself. Get to heart of matter.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Settle domestic differences. Seek greater harmony at home. Partnership, marriage disputes should be aired. If diplomatic, you earn respect. One who had been alienated makes conciliatory gesture. Accept.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be willing to change routine. Avoid undue pressure by granting credit to one who aided in project. Pisces is likely to be involved. Complete basic tasks. Steer clear of apparent shortcut methods.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Nothing now is apt to occur halfway. Involvements tend to be serious. If you wish it otherwise, be especially cautious. Curb tendency to be extravagant. Capricorn may be in picture. Romantic complication is not unlikely.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Finish assignment. Be sympathetic toward one who seeks guidance. The more aid you give the greater reservoir of good you will build. Specifically, a family member is confused and turns to you.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Strive for original approach. Some will claim you are a new person. Coming from some, this will be a compliment. Others will be giving vent to resentment. Key now is to be flexible. Disregard relative who complains.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Hunch can save you money-if you follow through. Learn by teaching. Means share knowledge. Accent is on money and how to obtain more of it. Social contact can lead to profitable venture. Be aware.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Cycle is such that you can break from restrictions. Emphasize independence. Some around you are beginning to get idea that you are an individual. Means you are coming into your own.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Take nothing for granted, including promises. There are some who want you to miscue. Protect your interests. Get accounting; take inventory. Be considerate toward individual who is temporarily incapacitated.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You can learn, make gains. Key is to know that business and friendship may not mix. Gemini, Virgo individual plays prominent role. Money picture is brighter than might be apparent. Beneficial change occurs.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Vitality makes a comeback. You feel more alive, vigorous. Ambition returns. You have greater sense of direction. Accept challenge. Family will back you. Gift purchase is favored. Show appreciation to loved one.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are creative, a fine executive, but not so good at taking orders. Project begun in 1970 is due to bear fruit this year. Social activity accelerates. You will be happier, with May indicated as an outstanding month.

Roberts Recalled

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) — The Boston Bruins have called up right winger Doug Roberts from their Boston Braves farm club for a National Hockey League game against the North Stars Wednesday night.

Roberts had to fill in for Ken Hodge who had to be scratched from the traveling roster Tuesday because the ankle injury which has sidelined him since Feb. 3 was too sore.

Coach Tom Johnson said the Bruins may also be without John McKenzie who went to Calgary because of the unexpected death of his brother.

"I don't want to take any chances on being shorthanded," Johnson said. "This game is too important to us in the first place fight with New York."

He said McKenzie is expected to be on hand for Wednesday's game.

Hodge had been able to skate the last couple of days without trouble, but the injury flared up again.

In 65 games with the American Hockey League Braves, Roberts has scored 31 goals and 33 assists. He was acquired from California last summer after playing three seasons with the Seals as a defenseman.

The Minnesota game is the first of a two-game road trip that winds up Saturday night in Pittsburgh.

Boston returns home for a game against the Penguins Sunday night.

Boston has won their last seven road games, and have equalled their own NHL mark of 24 road victories in a season.

Gerry Cheevers, unbeaten in his last 26 starts, will start in the goal.

High-flying Dave Cowens of the Boston Celtics snares a rebound away from Cincinnati's Sam Lacey in a recent game at the Garden. Don Chaney is looking on. Cowens and Chaney are just two reasons why the Celts are back in the play-offs.

The Intra-murals people have introduced a new sport to their already large list. It's called Wrist Wrestling and is open to men, women, individuals and teams.

There are four weight divisions in both men's and women's competition. There are trophies for individual champs and runners-up, as well as a trophy to the team champs.

Entries are due Monday, March 13, and matches will begin on Monday, March 20. Practice sessions will be held in Boyden beginning at 7 p.m. on March 14-16.

Commentary

A Question Of Balance

By ROY LYONS

The realists in the hierarchy of the World Hockey Association are resigned to the fact that they cannot expect miracles when play commences next October. This is especially unfortunate because of the platform on which the WHA is being erect - a promise of keen competition. Undoubtedly the WHA owners are hoping to capitalize on the frequent absence of competition which has plagued the National Hockey League since the coming of expansion. It's frustrating to realize that the narrow-minded NHL owners will be able to ignore the challenge and turn their backs on the problem once again.

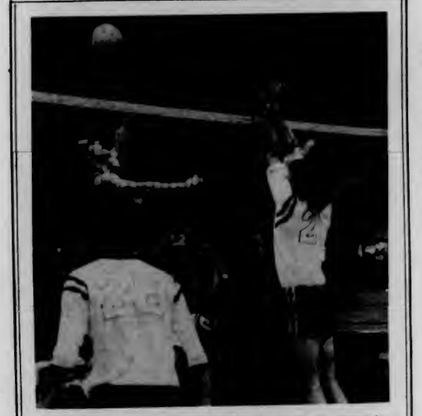
The problem is caused by a distinct lack of overall team balance. It was disregarded when the league doubled in size overnight. It was ignored again when Buffalo and Vancouver were admitted for the 1970-71 season and apparently will be neglected yet again when Long Island and Atlanta begin operations next season.

And won't the Deep South receive a warm welcome to the National Hockey League if teams like Boston and New York invade Atlanta on successive nights? The fans there would probably be wondering if General Sherman didn't have hockey skates slung over his shoulder when he marched through the South a century earlier. Could you blame them?

When the Eastern Division (Montreal and Boston) won four consecutive Stanley Cups against the hopelessly outclassed St. Louis Blues, Chicago was shifted to the expansion division to insure a more competitive play-off finale. Wasn't that an admission by the owners that they do not intend to attack the real problem? It was considered a major accomplishment that Minnesota was able to stay in the race with Chicago for even half a season. If Chicago Coach Billy Reay ever turns around in late March and sees anyone within shouting distance, he'll likely be rubbing his eyes in disbelief.

Maybe someday the National League owners will make an attempt to solve this problem, and hockey fans will be able to see a combination of the best talent and the keenest competition. Unfortunately, the owners seem to regard that possibility as having your cake and eating it, too.

Nicklaus Passes Palmer In $



NEW YORK (AP) — Jack Nicklaus has forged ahead of Arnold Palmer as pro golf's all-time leading money winner.

The "Golden Bear's" $30,000 victory Monday in the Doral-Eastern Open Tournament pushed his career earnings to $1,477,200.86. Palmer, the game's first million-dollar winner, did not play Doral and his $1,471,226.83 earnings remained unchanged.

Nicklaus' first prize also sent his season's total to $94,037, well above the pace of his record $244,490 last year. Tom Weiskopf is second in this year's earnings with $63,067, followed by the veteran Bob Rosburg with $57,187.

Nicklaus also tops the 1972 Exemption Point Standings with 92,223.3, followed by Weiskopf and Rosburg. The points are awarded on the basis of performances.

The money leaders released Tuesday by the PGA Tournament Players Division: 1. Nicklaus, $94,037; 2. Weiskopf, $63,067; 3. Rosburg, $57,187; 4. Grier Jones, $53,385; 5. George Archer, $51,377; 6. Bob Murphy, $47,248; 7. Lanny Wadkins, $44,277; 8. Paul Harney, $37,951; 9. Miller Barber, $37,856; 10. Johnny Miller, $36,830.

Skaters Face Second Hurdle

By BILL BALLOU

In the beginning there were eight teams involved and eight games to play.

But the beginning was Saturday, and as of tonight there are just four teams left and three games to play.

The aforementioned references, biblical and otherwise, are about the ECAC division II playoffs that are now currently being played to determine the Divisional champion. Saturday's quarter-final round eliminated the "chaff" from the "wheat" as far as the playoffs go and left Vermont, UMass, Merrimack and Buffalo to fight it out for a chance to advance to the finals.

The semi-final round involving these teams will be played tonight and the opponents will be Vermont-Buffalo at Vermont and UMass-Merrimack at Orr Rink.

The odd thing about these pairings is that with the way the divisional seeds are supposed to work, the best team should meet the "worst" team, with the two in the middle playing each other.

The problem arises when it is realized that Buffalo, although seeded two places below Merrimack, is really the better of the two teams. But being the low seed of the four remaining clubs, they are scheduled to play the top seed, Vermont. That leaves UMass to play Merrimack.

So we're left with UMass having the easier of the assignments.

In spite of the fact that the Redmen can consider themselves fortunate to have drawn the "easier" assignment, they have by no means a free ride.

Merrimack is a good team, a team that has been improving steadily since the beginning of the season. They defeated Salem State 4-2 in their quarter-final match, not an impressive decision, but one that does indicate an ability to play defense. The Warriors most impressive credential to date, however, must rate as the stunning 5-4 overtime victory against Bowdoin.

When you compare that score with the 8-4 shellacking that Bowdoin gave UMass just a couple of weeks ago, it becomes apparent that Merrimack possesses the strength to deal Redmen playoff hopes a rude setback.

As for the Redmen hopes, they are, of course, still flourishing, and after some encouraging signs on Saturday it appears UMass is finally ready to play hockey again.

Probably the most encouraging of these signs was the emergence of the second line as a scoring threat. The trio of Eric Scrafield, Don Riley, and Chico Shea had been suffering through an abominable season scoring-wise, but on Saturday clicked for three goals and had a fourth disallowed.

Center Don Riley was the big gun for that line as he hit for two goals while picking up an assist. But just as important was his continued fine play on the penalty-killing combo and his work defensively.

Also encouraging was the good work on defense of UMass captain Brian Sullivan. Sullivan was forced to sit out the last regular season game against Providence because of stomach cramps and his absence was really felt in that 7-3 loss.

His main asset is an ability to skate the puck out of the zone and quarterback the Redmen offense while he's on the ice.

The UMass bench, consisting of Grabowski, Jim Lynch, Lonnie Avery, and Bob Shilalie is going to have to come through if the Redmen are to go all the way.

But first they must tackle Merrimack, and they can't afford to look past this game.

Ask the Bowdoin College Polar Bears.

Long, Long Season Ends Tonight In Orono

By EARLE BARROLL

Entitle this one "UMass to Orono or Bust."

It's quite a note on which to bring the basketball season to an end, but perhaps it's more symbolic of the character of the 25 games that preceded this trip...it was definitely a long, long season.

Much more than the six hours it takes to get to the campus of UMaine, much more than the aggravation and hardships that have befallen the hoopsters this year. It was longer, much longer and much more...it was a long trip to Virginia-more than six hours by car, but for a pro shorter by air-that made this ride longer than was anticipated.

This is the type of game that you play just for the sake of completing the schedule. It means nothing to the future in terms of laurels for the Redmen as Rhode Island easily disposed of Maine and New Hampshire last week to break the four year dominance of UMass in the Yankee Conference.

But it is better to finish 15-11 than 14-12 and for UMass to accomplish this Maine might have to act abnormal. The Black Bears have not been beaten at home this season and this includes an early season stunner over Rhode Island that set the trend for the home court dominance that prevailed this season.

They just sit up there in their little castle that seats 3500 and turns away another 1500 and wait for the opposition to finally weed its way through the wilderness and then give them the old "step into my den said the spider to the fly" trick.

If you just take into account the complete turnabout in the outcomes of Redman games against URI and UNH on their own courts then you have an idea as to the different picture that will be painted most likely at Orono tonight...a 34-point win is out of the question.

Last year UMass went to Orono with that big guy from Virginia and the N.I.T. phoned the morning of the game with UMass' second straight bid. That night Maine went beyond its capabilities and almost knocked the Redmen off...-strange things do happen at Orono.

An interesting note about the Maine court is that it's ten feet shorter than normal. This obviously causes problems, but thanks to the St. Louis Orchestra that performed at the Cage on Monday, UMass was forced to practice at Hopkins Academy...which just happens to have a court that's ten feet shorter than regulation.

Great scheduling.

All this tonight beginning at 8 p.m.

The Yankee Conference All-Academic basketball team was announced last week and Redman John Betancourt was one of the five picked on the first team.

To qualify for this mythical team a player must maintain a B average or better, either for his academic career, or for a full year and must be a starter or a "sixth man" on his team.

Also selected to the first team were forwards Peter Gavett of Maine, and Don Blackman of URI and guards Doug Melody of UConn and Dwight Peters of New Hampshire.

Redman Charlie Peters and UConn's Bob Parsons, a couple of centers, won honorable mention in the voting.

In case you haven't heard yet the following teams have been picked for the N.I.T.: Fordham, St. John's, Syracuse, Niagara, Jacksonville, St. Joseph's, Texas at El Paso, and Princeton.

The remaining eight berths will come from the runners-up in the major conferences around the country.

Providence College was given one of the three at large berths for the eastern regionals of the N.C.A.A. basketball tourney. On Monday night the Friars went down to Jacksonville and rolled over the Dolphins, 90-76.

Keeping with tradition, New England has been given another easy first round opponent. Remember the past two seasons with UMass' opening round draws in the N.I.T.?

Well, Providence only drew the second ranked team in the nation in the latest national poll, Pennsylvania. And to top it off the game will be played at St. John's which will most likely be swarming with Quakers...not the quiet, serene type either.

P.S...The commentary is coming.

IN UNISON THEY CAME...IN UNISON THEY LEAVE–Tonight will be the last game for the UMass basketball careers of (l-r) captain Mike Pagliara, John Betancourt, Chris Coffin and Rick Vogeley. Is that a fly in Pag's eye or is it a tear (said very quietly)? (MDC photo by Barbara Brecher)

WMUA

Tonight at 7:50 p.m., Dan Kamal and Bill Ballou will bring you all the action of the semifinal playoff hockey game between UMass and Merrimack College live on WMUA, 91.1 fm. The Redmen won the first game of this single-elimination series against St. Anselm's, 5-3. Should they win tonight, they will play the winner of the Buffalo-Vermont game, also being played tonight. All indications point to a tough contest this evening as the Warriors of Merrimack have been playing fine hockey of late. So be sure to stay tuned to "stage two" in the UMass drive to the Division II playoffs.

SOS, Concerts Funded; WMPIRG Approved

Bulletin–In late action at last night's meeting, the Student Senate endorsed the funding of WMPIRG and directed Trustee Lee Sandwen to present the WMPIRG petition to the Board of Trustees and move its adoption.

By MARY SMITH

Two compromise bills insuring funds for both Students Offering Support and the Concert Committee were passed at last night's Student Senate meeting. Initially presented as one motion, both bills were altered considerably before passage.

The first bill requires the Concert Committee to hold the Spring Concert specifically as a fund-raising event for Friends of Belchertown. The bill also provides for a fund-raising campaign to be started immediately, proceeds to be divided evenly between the Concert Committee and SOS. An amendment to the bill charges the Committee with the task of contacting a record company concerning the possibility of contracting recording rights to the concert. A major portion of the proceeds would go directly to S.O.S.

The second bill authorizes the transfer of $1297.95 from the Campus Chest to SOS. Originally the bill called for the transfer of the entire Concert account. A compromise version reduced the amount to $2,000. The final version passed by the Senate utilizes funds left over from the class governments and leaves all the funds previously allocated to the Concert Committee intact.

The major opposition to the bill was voiced by Senator Paul Doran. Doran urged the Senate to defeat the motion in favor of the earlier bill which would take the money directly from the Concert Committee account. Doran claimed that to accept the Campus Chest version, as recommended by the Finance Committee, would defeat the purpose of the bill.

Doran stated that the earlier version would clearly demonstrate the students' willingness to give up something of their own in order to aid the Belchertown suit. After the Campus Chest amendment was accepted, Doran withdrew his sponsorship of the bill.

Proponents of the bill argued that the bill would give an adequate amount to both groups. With the added $2,000 the Committee, it was argued, would be able to produce a better and larger concert. The larger concert could result in greater contributions to SOS. Following the acceptance of the SOS budget, the bill was passed by a roll call vote of 56-13-10.

In other business the Senate passed a motion dealing with the present penalties concerning illegal removal of University property. Instead of the present policy which empowers the Judiciary to suspend a student for a first offense, the bill recommends that the Court consider suspension only in extreme cases when involving a first offender, and as a sanction when dealing with the event of a multiple offense.

The bill grants the Student Judiciary with the power to levy a fine of a minimum of $5 and up to three times the value of the stolen article. The bill also requires the Judiciary to recommend appropriate medical help if the defendant is determined to have a problem associated with mental health. An amendment to the bill requires that the money collected from the fines be returned to the Campus Store.

In budgetary matters, the Senate voted to fund the Nursing Club. The rationale presented by the Club proposes a number of services such as family planning, parent education, mental health agencies, and day care centers to be performed by the club. The motion to fund the Nursing Club was passed by a one vote margin, and withstood a later motion to reconsider the vote.

Discussion on the bills followed opening remarks by Senate President Lee Sandwen. Sandwen stated that students will be able to beat a major tuition hike this year if they are willing to actively work towards this goal. Sandwen also announced a new Voter Registration Drive to be held in the Campus Center on March 16.

Great Decisions

Foreign Aid Debated

By ETHEL HARRIS

The problems of American foreign aid and American involvement in foreign governments were debated in the Great Decisions panel discussion entitled "Poor Nations and Rich Nations: Can the Gap Be Narrowed?". The discussion, sponsored by the Orchard Hill Area Government and broadcast over WFCR, was held in Webster House lounge last evening.

Moderating the panel was Luther Allen of the UMass department of political science. Panelists included Bruce Morris of the UMass economics department and dean of the School of Home Economics; Ernesto Zambrano, visiting professor from Columbia at the School of International Education; and Achlyn Lynch of the Afro-American Studies department.

Professor Morris stated that the gap between rich and poor nations could not be fully narrowed. Rather he defined the issue as whether "a comfortable existence can be attained by the masses." Although he agreed that the underdeveloped nations must industrialize, Morris emphasized the importance of "human development"--training for specific skills and more effective manpower planning.

Morris also suggested that agricultural techniques in underdeveloped countries must be improved, as 60% to 80% of the population still live on farms. He stressed the need for foreign aid in the form of capital funds and technical aid. As a very small portion of the American GNP goes to foreign aid, Morris suggested either increasing aid or concentrating it in a few nations. He emphasized the need for aid with "no strings attached", and for the U.S. to expect no immediate economic benefits from this aid.

Professor Zambrano agreed that foreign aid to underdeveloped nations was necessary, but that many nations give foreign aid out of their own self-interest. He also stressed the problem of private foreign investments in the underdeveloped nations; for example, roughly fifty per cent of the manufacturing industry and eighty per cent of the mining industry in Latin American is in the hands of American business.

As a result, there has been an increased demand for the nationalization of basic industries, according to Zambrano. Furthermore, because foreign aid causes resentment in underdeveloped nations, the developed countries are unwilling to give assistance.

Professor Lynch referred to "overexploitation" in the underdeveloped nations because of colonial policies in Europe and American expansion after the First World War. He claimed that because these nations are primary producers of raw materials they must pay high prices for machinery produced in the West, but cannot achieve a balance of trade due to the low prices of raw materials on the world market.

Lynch also criticized "cultural oppression" of the Third World nations because of Western Control of the school systems and means of mass communication. He cited the problems of countries such as Jamaica, which depend on tourism, and how the "cultural ethos" of that country has been affected by commercialization.

In regard to foreign aid, Lynch claimed that resources of the underdeveloped nations are limited, and cannot be generated without some outside help. Yet he stated that many countries would not give aid unless they felt it would be necessary for defense. He also pointed out that aid was reaching the wealthy elite, and not the masses.

All panelists agreed that to some extent the foreign policy of the United States was unsuccessful. Morris stressed the need for multinational aid, while Lynch emphasized the need for aid without putting nations in a "position of subservience". Zambrano stated that most nations who give aid do not admit their motives--such as defense or economic interests--for doing so.

The next lecture in the Great Decisions series will be held March 15 on the topic of "Guns and/or Butter: What Price National Security?"

The Town

Selectmen Prepare For Town Meeting

By CHARLEY BERKOW

The Amherst Board of Selectmen spent most of their meeting this week preparing for next Monday's Town Meeting. They hammered out their stand on the budget, amended by the Finance Committee, which will be presented to the Town Meeting.

In other business in their four and one-half hour meeting on Monday night, the Selectmen amended the proposed farmland assessment by-law in hopes of making it constitutional, met with members of the school committee, announced the settlement of the state tax account, and heard the town manager's appointments to the Council on Aging.

William Connolly, of Potwine Lane, brought a petition signed by residents of every dwelling unit but one on Potwine Lane in opposition to proposed land takings along that street.

The town wants to increase the legal-right-of-way to 50 feet from 33 feet. Town Manager Allen Torrey said that this will force builders to build houses far enough away from the road to make it easier for the town to increase the width of the road, should it decide to do so.

Torrey said that this does not mean that the road will be widened in the near future.

The residents want to keep Potwine a quiet country road, and feared that widening it would ruin the atmosphere of the area.

The Selectmen voted 3-2 to support the Finance Committee's recommendation that the Town Meeting appropriate money to pay for the land-taking on Potwine Lane. The two new Selectmen, Bob Garvey and Leo Bouchard, a resident of Potwine Lane, were the dissenters.

The Selectmen decided not to support the Finance Committee's recommendation that the Selectmen not be given salaries. The Finance Committee had amended the Selectmen's budget requests to not include funds for the salaries.

The Town Meeting will be voting on the Selectmen's budget, as amended by the Finance Committee. This raised the question of whose budget the Town Meeting would be voting on-the Selectmen's or the Finance Committee's.

The Selectmen agreed that it was their budget, although the current practice made it appear to be the Finance Committee's. They decided that it was too late to change this practice by Monday night's Town Meeting, but to look into it in the future.

The Selectmen voted, 3-2, not to support the Finance Committee's recommendation that the library budget be increased by 43.2%. The Selectmen supported the requested 57.6% library budget increase.

In another split vote, the Selectmen supported the Finance Committee's recommendation that the town pay a professional personnel consultant to make a study of the town's personnel classification system, salary schedule and personnel record system.

Selectmen Michael P. Sullivan Jr. and Garvey dissented, saying that the Personnel Board and the Town Manager could do a good job more cheaply.

The Selectmen earlier tried to make the proposed farm land assessment by-law constitutional. They amended it to become effective only after approval by the state Attorney General and a town referendum scheduled for November.

They decided to mail copies of the revisions and a legal opinion on the constitutionality of the by-law to Town Meeting members, along with a letter explaining what was sent.

The School Committee met with the Board and asked them to switch $10,000 from the proposed School Building Account to the School Account. The money is to be used to remodel a cow-barn on the building site.

A School-Committee member explained that the proposed use for the money had accidentally been left off of the bond issue, not yet voted by the town. He said that the state will now reimburse some of the remodeling money, which it wouldn't before.

The state payment-in-lieu of property taxes on University property will increase by $123,978 over last year. The payment will be $365,513.

The amount of the payment is adjusted every five years. The increase is due to an increase in the value per acre and an increase in the state tax rate.

Torrey announced the appointment of Ms. Mary Gatslick and Mr. Arthur Miedeck to the Council on Aging. Ms. Eviline Sears was reappointed to a new three-year term, leaving all vacancies on the Council filled.

The Board heard a report by the DPW on the North East Bypass plans. The Board also discussed giving the Secretary, Ms. Yarrows, time off in return for the time she spends at the Board of Selectmen meetings, and discussed the Hampshire County Selectmen's Association Spring Meeting, which they will host.

The Selectmen granted several licenses, including one to the UMass Campus Center for six new pinball machines.

Patricia Bonner-Lyons appealed to youth and women yesterday to change the way things are being run in America. (MDC photo by Jim Robinson)

Women And Youth Lead Progressive Movements

By PEGGY KENNEDY

Patricia Bonner-Lyons, a militant who recently ran for Boston School Committee said last night that the New Politics is Peoples' Politics that reaches the small people.

She was speaking on the "New Politics: the Role of Women and Youth," in the Engineering East Auditorium.

Traditions of our present politics are traditions of monarchy, she said. Politicians are white, Anglo-Saxon, and supported by corporate and big-time agricultural friends.

"The trouble with today's politicians," she says, "is that they're so busy trying to decide between sharp and cheddar cheese that they don't think about what they're going to put the cheese on. We need bread!"

Youth, she says, can change these ideas; they can hear the problems in this country. "It's young people who'll make sure we get out of Vietnam" she says. "They're the ones who went to Washington last spring." "It's young people who recognize the wage freeze for what it is--a President telling people they don't have a right to strike at the same time he's raising the cost of food and rent.

Ms. Bonner-Lyons stressed the importance of the vote in changing the system. "If we don't vote, we're just part of Spiro Agnew's Silent Majority," she said.

Women's role is one of leadership, too, according to Ms. Bonner-Lyons. "Most progressive movements have been led by women," she says. Women have done all the background, backbreaking work for the Peace, Welfare, and Civil Rights Movements; it's time we started to take some credit."

Ms. Bonner-Lyons speech was sponsored by Women in the Economy and Political System, the Women's Caucus of the School of Ed., and the Young Workers Liberation League.

Miller Evidence Thrown Out

By MARDY HAHNE

A Hampshire County Superior Court judge's ruling has apparently left District Attorney John M. Callahan with little evidence in a drug case. Judge Francis Lappin ruled Wednesday in favor of a defense motion to suppress evidence the DA presented the court to uphold his claims.

John D. Miller, 32, of Wendell has been indicted on charges of possession of drugs with intent to sell including 12 pounds of marijuana and large quantities of both cocaine and LSD.

Wednesday's ruling leaves the district attorney and the Amherst police, who brought the original charge, 10 days in which to decide if they will appeal. An appeal would take the ruling to disallow the evidence to the Massachusetts Supreme Court. Atty. Callahan indicated he is considering an appeal.

Complicating the case is a civil suit for $100,000 filed in Hampshire County Superior Court Monday by Miller against Amherst Police Officer Edward Montleon. That case will be heard independently of any criminal action before the court.

Judge Lappin on Wednesday asked the Springfield Daily News, Daily Hampshire Gazette and Massachusetts Daily Collegian not to publish any of the testimony given Tuesday before the judge, on the motion to suppress evident from Defense Council Harry Miles. Reporters for city papers indicated stories prepared for Wednesday included some testimony. After the judge's request, the Springfield and Northampton papers withdrew their stories.

In essence, the testimony by Amherst police officers described how the vehicle in which Miller was a passenger was entered and the alleged illegal drugs removed. The defense contended that the law covering legal search of a vehicle without a warrant did not apply in this instance and therefore the rights of the defendant had been violated.

Although Miller was the only defendant involved in the hearings over the past two days, the driver and other three passengers of the vehicle were also charged with drug offences and are awaiting trial. Harry Gold, Ronald Kosnicki and Laura Lyon have all declared drug dependency; their cases are postponed pending therapy. Charles Vokman was not present at the time of the hearing.

Northampton Tries Flexible Scheduling

A bold new venture in scheduling which is expected to motivate students toward an enthusiastic attainment of end-of-course goals has been adopted by unanimous approval of faculty and administrators of Northampton Juinor College.

The scheduling is anticipated to allow the students a greater flexibility in arranging their academic time, as well as facilitating their learning processes.

Sister Bloithin Sullivan, dean of the college, states that the academic year will be divided into fall, winter, spring and summer terms of varying lengths, with units of three, six and 12 weeks. A student may elect to take courses all these terms, which would allow him to earn an associate degree in 1-1/2 years without undue academic stress.

Other students may prefer to choose a schedule whereby they can have a mixture of work experience and courses. With this flexibile schedule, there are numerous options possible.

One of the most novel innovations which will be initiated at NJC in September will be a seminar format type course which will enable the student to concentrate on just one subject for a period of three weeks before going on to the next course. In other words, the student registers for just one course at a time, and likewise this is the instructor's only assignment for a period of three weeks.

The instructor is responsible for meeting the student within this three-week period for the same number of class hours as he met with students in the traditional three-hours-a-week for a 15-week semester. Since there are no conflicts with other classes, the decision on classroom days and hours is made by instructors and students together. The only requirement is that together they honor the total number of class hours required for the course.

Other options open to the student are the selection of taking two courses at a time, completing each pair of six weeks; or in mixture of one pair of two six-week courses followed by two single three-week courses.

A second semester innovation built into the system will be the introduction of individual process courses. The instructor sets up the behavioral objectives for the course, establishes the units of work for the course, and presents to the student a variety of ways to achieve the objectives. The student moves throught the units at his own pace and requests a check-point evaluation whenever he feels he has mastered the stated objectives.

One of the most exciting aspects of the new scheduling is the possibility of incorporating academic internships and work-experience programs into this flexible program. In any of the sub-units of three weeks or six weeks, a students may combine actual work experience with his classroom work since he can now work full time during any of these time units without interfering with his other course work.

This option is open to the secretarial skill areas and the business administration areas but can be used also by liberal arts majors who wish to do field work in education and other professional fields.

McGovern Students To Raise Funds

Fresh from Senator George McGovern's strong showing in the New Hampshire Primary Election, the Students For McGovern met last night to plan new efforts. McGovern, who captured 35% of the Democratic vote on Tuesday, will be returning to New England next month for the Massachusetts Primary Election.

To raise funds for their continued efforts, a concert will be held next Wednesday evening, March 15, at 8:00 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom.

Admission will be one dollar. There will be two bands performing for your entertainment, the Barrel House Blues Band, from the local area, and another group to be named later.

State College Trustees Support $100 Tuition Raise

The State College board of trustees indicated yesterday that it is willing to raise tuition from $200 to $300 for the 28,400 students in the 11 colleges under its jurisdiction.

The board's position, outlined in a statement submitted to the joint legislative committee on education during a tuition hearing yesterday, was the first break in what has been a solid wall of opposition to tuition increases by public higher education leaders.

After warning that any substantial tuition increase could keep large numbers of low-income students out of college, the statement said the state college board recognizes the pressure for an increase and would be willing to raise tuition to $300.

"Of course, such an increase would have to be contingent upon comparable adjustments by the university and community college sectors," the statement said. It also said the new rate should not begin until the fall of 1973. Currently all 80,000 in-state students in state and community colleges and the university pay $200 tuition.

The statement was prepared by Mrs. Janet Murphy, a state college staff member, on behalf of the board and provost, Dr. Lawrence E. Dennis.

The state college statement, which was not read at the hearing, was in contrast to positions taken by University of Massachusetts president Robert Wood and Patrick McCarthy, acting chancellor of the board of higher education.

Both men said their boards sympathized with the financial plight of the Commonwealth and might be willing to consider out-of-state tuition increases but opposed in-state hikes because they would keep low-income students out of college.

Wood said most of the bills proposing tuition increases are similar to last years' bills.

"We opposed them then and we oppose them now," Wood said. "We continue to believe in low-tuition public higher education."

Both men said their boards would carefully study Gov. Sargent's proposal, released yesterday, which would base tuition on the family's ability to pay. That bill will be heard later at a special hearing. A major tuition bill supported by the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation, which would base tuition on the actual per pupil cost of education was heard earlier by the education committee.

Yesterday's subdued and sparsely attended session was in sharp contrast to last year's hearing when the Gardner Auditorium was packed with students who had come to oppose a tuition increase.

Muskie Leads In N.H. Delegate Count

Sen. Edmund S. Muskie campaigning in New Hampshire, leads in the Democratic Primary delegation count. He won 15 out of the 20 possible delegates. (AP)

MANCHESTER, N.H. (AP) — Sen. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine pulled ahead in his fight to gain a majority of New Hampshire's Democratic National Convention delegates as the votes were counted Wednesday.

It was Phase 2 of a Tuesday presidential primary Muskie won with 48 per cent of the vote, while Sen. George S. McGovern of South Dakota was strengthening his rival White House bid by scoring an unexpected 37 per cent.

With 91 per cent of the state's precincts reporting, Muskie held a 15-5 lead over McGovern in the balloting for delegates.

The close race for the delegates was even more surprising than McGovern's preferential primary showing, as Muskie managers had expected a sweep of the 20 convention slots. New Hampshire will cast 18 nominating votes at the national convention in Miami Beach, Fla. Each delegate elected in the Tuesday balloting will get 9-10s of a vote.

Muskie's preferential primary vote fell short of an absolute majority of the ballots cast in New Hampshire, and the outcome provided a less than overwhelming New England sendoff for his primary campaigns across the nation, with a tough Florida contest coming up next Tuesday.

Both McGovern and Muskie are entered there, and both of them Wednesday downgraded the significance of an 11-way race which Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace is favored to win.

McGovern said he had scored "both a moral and a political victory."

Muskie claimed "a good, solid victory, considering all the problems we faced in New Hampshire."

He said, "We deliberately sacrificed the possibility of a maximum showing in order to have some resources left for the other primaries."

But the political psychology produced by McGovern's potent challenge to Muskie on his own northern New England territory was sure to encourage Muskie's rivals.

New Hampshire's verdict makes the coming primaries-22 to go-the more crucial, for it now appears Muskie will have to wage Tuesday battles all spring long if he is to capture a nomination his managers once had hoped to lock up early in the game.

President Nixon, who captured 69 per cent of the Republican ballots cast and swept past two challengers-Rep. Paul N. McCloskey and John Ashbrook-won the 14 GOP nominating votes at stake in New Hampshire.

Indians Claim Total Victory

GORDON, Neb. (AP) — Leaders of an Indian demonstration here claimed a "total and complete victory" Wednesday and agreed to leave this community after local and state officials joined them in a statement calling for a federal investigation into the death of Raymond Yellow Thunder.

The statement was signed by leaders of the band of 1,000 Indians that came to Gordon Tuesday, and by Sheridan County Attorney Michael Smith, Gordon's Mayor Bruce Moore, and Clive Short, personal representative of Gov. J.J. Exon.

The joint statement called for a "federal grand jury investigation, congressional investigation and Justice Department investigation of the Raymond Yellow Thunder case."

Nebraska's Legislature earlier in the day ordered the state attorney general to investigate the death of Yellow Thunder, whose body was found more than a week after he was allegedly attacked outside an American Legion Hall.

Russell Means of Cleveland, Ohio, and Dennis Banks of Washington, national coordinators of the American Indian Movement, expressed complete satisfaction with the outcome of a meeting with state and local officials.

In addition to the investigation, the statement said Smith would furnish a complete autopsy report on Yellow Thunder's death to Dr. Jesse Samuels of Hartford, Conn. The Indians are bringing Samuels to the Pine Ridge, S.D. Indian Reservation to conduct a second autopsy.

It was also agreed that Smith would attend the new autopsy, that a Gordon Human Relations Council, with half-Indian, half-white membership, would be created, that Indians would be aided in participating in the electoral process and in seeking public office, and that officer John Paul would be suspended from the Gordon police force.

Paul's suspension would be effective pending the outcome of an investigation of charges lodged against him by the Indians that he was mistreating Indian women.

Two Indians who had been booked Monday night for drunkenness and jailed in nearby Rushville also were released as part of the agreement.

Smith termed the statement "fair" and said "some good will come from this if we can have a better understanding."

In Lincoln, Nebraska, Indian Commissioner Robert Mackey said he has unofficial word from Bureau of Indian Affairs sources in Washington that a full-scale investigation of Indian affairs will be launched in Nebraska.

Mackey said the investigation later "would branch into other areas of the state" and would not be limited to criminal matters. He said it would include employment and "other atrocities."

The purpose of the state attorney general's probe would be to bring recommendations to the legislature for possible action.

Sen. Terry Carpenter of Scottsbluff, sponsor of the motion, said the legislature has a duty to let Indians who feel aggrieved know "that we are concerned."

The motion passed in Lincoln by the legislature specified that such an investigation should not interfere with or preclude a grand jury investigation.

In Brief...

Anti-Busing In Aid-For-Education Urged

WASHINGTON (AP) — The House for the second time in four months insisted Wednesday on inclusion of strong anti-busing provisions in an aid-for-education bill.

By roll-call vote of 272 to 139, it instructed its conferees on a Senate-House conference committee to stand firm against weaker Senate busing provisions.

The busing provisions have held up congressional action on a five-year $24 billion higher education bill. Final action may be further delayed if the Senate refuses to bow to the House position.

FAA Grounds Sky Marshal Program

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Federal Aviation Administration said Wednesday the sky marshal program, as such, will end April 1.

On that date, all but 220 of the 1,300 customs security officers who have been serving as sky guards will be pulled off flight status and placed on duty on the ground.

Flights thereafter will be monitored by armed guards only on a selective basis, FAA airline security chief James Murphy told a news conference.

Committee Told Hartford Prison On Minimum Staff

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP) — Robert Wambolt, a captain of guards at the prison, told the legislative committee that security was at its weekend "minimum" level when the disturbance occurred.

He also said one guard was slightly injured when violence broke out in the prisoners' dining hall.

Nixon Reforms Document Classification

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon, declaring that bureaucrats have been using secrecy stamps too often, ordered sweeping new procedures Wednesday aimed at ending "the many abuses of the security system."

In essence, Nixon directed that fewer documents be classified in the future and that those already designated "top secret," "Secret" and "confidential" be made public more quickly than in the past.

In a statement issued as he signed an executive order for the first major overhaul of classification procedures since 1953, Nixon said:

"The many abuses of the security system can no longer be tolerated. Fundamental to our way of life is the belief that when information which properly belongs to the public is systematically withheld by those in power, the people soon become ignorant of their own affairs, distrustful of those who manage them, and--eventually--incapable of determining their own destinies."

The President contended that the old setup "failed to meet the standards of an open and democratic society, allowing too many papers to be classified for too long a time." He said, "classification has frequently served to conceal bureaucratic mistakes or to prevent embarrassment to officials and administrations."

Aides acknowledged that the impact of Nixon's directive could only be determined after it goes into effect on June 1. But they predicted a significant reduction in governmental secrecy because the President is sharply reducing the number of officials authorized to impose the "top secret" classification.

In like vein, the top-secret designation in the future can be used in only a dozen departments and agencies plus the executive office of the president. Under the old rules, 24 departments and agencies had such powers.

A key Nixon proviso sets up automatic timetables for down-grading and eventually declassifying all secret documents except the most sensitive. In most cases, documents are to be made public in from 6 to 10 years after being classified.

The aim is to release secret information after 8 years and confidential documents after 6 years.

Even where the most sensitive information is concerned, automatic declassification is called for after 30 years unless the head of the department involved states in writing that it should continue to be withheld on grounds it is essential to the national security or its disclosure would place an individual-typically an intelligence agent- in immediate jeopardy of physical harm.

In the future, classification stamps can be employed only if unauthorized disclosure of a document "could reasonably be expected" to damage the national security. Heretofore material could be classified if there were any expectation of damage, however remote.

The top-secret classification would be reserved for items that could cause grave damage to security if made public. The criteria for a secret designation would be serious damage and for confidential, simply damage.

To monitor the system, the President designated the National Security Council, and, in addition, set up a small Inter-agency Classification Review Committee "with extensive powers to oversee agency implementation of the new system, and to take action on complaints both from within and from outside the government on the administration of the order."

TWA Jet Explodes

LAS VEGAS, Nev. (AP) — A bomb ripped a hole in an unoccupied Trans World Airlines jetliner here Wednesday, the second bomb in two days attributed by authorities to a $2-million extortion scheme against the airline.

The incidents were the first time bombs actually placed aboard jetliners in an attempt to extort money, airline sources said.

The bombing triggered an intensified search of TWA's 238 planes at airports all over the world. At some airports all passengers boarding all planes were searched, as was baggage and freight.

Some airports employed X-ray machines to check luggage, metal detectors to scan passengers and dogs to sniff for explosives inside planes.

Some travelers cancelled reservations as delays of two hours or more were reported in TWA flights.

The bomb aboard the Boeing 707 exploded at 3:55 a.m., about seven hours after the plane arrived nonstop from New York City with 10 passengers and a crew of seven. The blast blew a large hole in the front fuselage, throwing debris about 100 feet at McCarran International Airport. It was parked about 300 yards from the main terminal.

Tuesday, a plastic explosive device was sniffed out by dogs in a cockpit of a TWA jetliner called back to Kennedy International Airport in New York from a flight to Los Angeles.

An anonymous caller had warned of the bomb and directed officials to an airport locker where they found a note saying that four TWA planes would be blown up at six-hour intervals unless $2-million ransom was paid.

The succeeding deadlines passed without incident. The bombing in Las Vegas came an hour before one of the six-hour periods.

The FBI, TWA and local authorities have refused to say if they would negotiate with the extortionist or whether any money has been paid.

Sources close to the investigation said authorities were checking TWA personnel records for any employee experienced in handling explosives or with a possible grudge against the company.

Airline personnel had access before the flights to both the New York plane and the Las Vegas jetliner.

The bomb that exploded aboard the Las Vegas jetliner was somehow smuggled aboard even though the plane was searched in New York and Las Vegas and armed guards were standing nearby.

It apparently was planted in the cockpit or in the rest rooms behind it, authorities said.

Irish Bomb Goes Off As Father Saves Child

LONDONDERRY, Northern Ireland (AP) — While a 60-second time bomb ticked, a father rushed into a garage here Wednesday and rescued his 12-month-old child strapped to a seat in a car.

Seconds after he came out with the baby in his arms, the bomb went off, wrecking the garage and two dozen cars.

The drama came as guerrillas launched a full-scale bomb assault on Londonderry.

Police said both father and child left immediately after the garage blast.

A police spokesman said the unidentified man had just driven into the garage when two youths armed with submachine guns burst in and dumped a package beside his car.

They shouted: "It's a time bomb! You have 60 seconds to get out."

Garage workers fled, but the man ignored the ticking bomb and for vital seconds grappled with safety straps holding the baby to the seat.

Belfast was like a city under siege. Security forces, alarmed by weekend explosions which claimed nearly 200 casualties including two dead, enforced a big clampdown.

In the Northern Ireland's Parliament, Prime Minister Brian Faulkner interrupted a debate to break the news of the illing of an Agriculture Ministry official on the border with the Irish Republic.

Faulkner said three men, two of them carrying guns, crossed over from the republic and shot the man dead near a customs post at Middletown in County Armagh.

Faulkner told Parliament the incident showed "A regrettable lack of control" by authorities in the republic.

The Northern Irish government has repeatedly accused the republic of allowing outlaws of the Irish Republican Army to operate against the North from bases south of the border.

The agriculture official was identified as Joseph Jardine, 44, a Protestant who also was a militiaman. Police said his assassins fired 42 shots at him from close range.

He was the 264th person killed in Northern Ireland's 31 months of violence.

Four bomb explosions rocked Londonderry, Northern Ireland's second city and a hotbed of Irish nationalism.

The blasts caused heavy damage but no casualties.

The biggest blast came from a 120-pound gelignite charge planted in a stolen taxi. It blew out the front of the city's main post office, a hotel and two other buildings.

If Women's Lib Could Rename The Buildings

By JAN LIVA

If Women's Lib. at UMass has its way, the new 28 story library will be named the Mother Jones Library. The group, which is petitioning for such a move, explained at yesterday's Women's International Day Rally in the S.U. Ballroom that Ms. Jones was a communist agitator who walked all over West Virginia in the 1930's agitating.

Women's Lib is also petitioning for Dickinson Hall, (the ROTC building) to be renamed Emma Goldman Hall. Ms. Goldman, also an agitator, was vocally active against J. Edgar Hoover in his younger days. A spokesman remarked that the building should be transformed "from a place for killing training to living training-a day care center."

These remarks and others were made yesterday by various Women's Lib speakers as a part of the continuous events of the Women's Cultural Week. Other topics discussed at the end of the rally included the role of the workingwomen, women in political movements and lesbianism.

A woman, identifying herself merely as "Ann," said that women must fight to achieve decent wages and working conditions. She criticized the system that forces women to work in the factories in Northampton for minimum wage.

Ann also pushed for abortion repeal stating that "they should be made available to those who cannot afford them." She added that day care centers are crucial to all women, especially the working woman.

The small audience, composed mostly of females with a few males present, listened next to a lesbian speaker. Surrounded by placards declaring: "All You Sexists Go To Hell," "Free All Political Prisoners," and "We Are Lesbains and We Are Beautiful," the speaker said: : "For too long we've let men define what a woman is. Now is the time that women must come out and speak out." She added that UMass has the Gay Women's Caucus, which sponsors informal dinners for women, and the Student Homophile League has literature about the gay women.

Your Move

The Faculty Senate's decision to endorse the establishment of a campus-wide Office of Teacher Evaluation and Improvement has far-reaching implications for the quality of education we receive here. It is a decision that should not go unnoticed. Along with the vote to reform the Athletic Council, it indicates that the faculty is beginning to breakout of its self-imposed shell of isolation and intransigence.

Faculty arguments against teacher evaluation have been ludicrous, or, to go a step further, schizophrenic. The arguments against evaluation are the same arguments that students use when arguing for the abolition of grades. It is quite a leap of logic for professors to contend that teacher evaluation is subjective and imprecise, since they daily inflict students with a grading system that is far worse than the evaluation methods they are condemning.

In essence, the decision makes evaluation bilateral. Not only will students face evaluation from their teachers (by the archaic grading system) but now students will be able to judge the value and effectiveness of a professor's teaching.

Until very recently, the university has judged the worth of professors with one real criteria: scholarship. If a professor was able to engage in original research and thinking within his own academic discipline, he was regarded as competent to teach. But anyone who attends classes here knows that while the faculty may have a great deal of knowledge, many professors are incapable of communicating that knowledge to students. We cherish that rare teacher who brings excitement and intellectual challenge to the classroom, but it is a sad comment on education that we remember such teachers precisely because there are so few of them.

Teacher evaluation will give the faculty the opportunity to receive constructive criticism from their students, so that they can see their strengths and weaknesses and then strive to improve. Now we will have the opportunity to judge our instructor's competence in much the same way that instructors judge ours.

But evaluation will not merely be "constructive criticism" that a professor can ignore if he wishes. Teaching ability will become one of the three ways to judge whether a professor deserves tenure, promotions, or salary increases. It will take its place beside the other measures: scholarship and service. Good teachers will be rewarded; bad teachers will be discovered. The poor teachers will find themselves in other endeavors, so that they will no longer be able to inflict their incompetence on unsuspecting students.

All of this means one thing: the quality of undergraduate teaching will improve.

It took students many years to achieve this victory for better education. It took hard work from several "generations" of strong-willed individuals, mostly from the Student Senate Academic Affairs Committee. Their committment to change did not grab any headlines, but it will have more educational consequences than most of the stories we read in the Collegian.

The next task must be to reform the way student themselves are evaluated. Our present grading system could be called a farce, if it didn't have such a destructive effect on students and our futures. For the next several years (it may take that long!) we must direct our attention to that issue.

SOS And WMPIRG

The Student Senate last night passed a motion to support WMPIRG and present its case for a two dollar student tax to the Board of Trustees.

That motion is fine and good and we wholeheartedly support it. We urge the Trustees to accept that motion and allow WMPIRG to collect a yearly tax of two dollars to support its activiies. If anything on this campus deserves total student body and total support from the community at large, it is WMPIRG and other groups like it.

Another matter we would like to commend the Senate on is the passing of the motion to fund SOS. It, like WMPIRG, is an organization that is doing something to help people that need help. Hopefully SOS and those that support it can push the state of Massachusetts in the right direction in treating the retarded.

While there are inherent problems in funding groups of the nature of WMPIRG and SOS whose work is not on campus and does not directly effect student life, we feel that in these two cases, the Senate took the appropriate course of action.

Socialist Perspective On Women

(Ed. note-This is the text of a speech Maggie Hloughton gave yesterday at International Women's Day.)

I'd like to explain a little bit about the socialist perspective on the women's movement. The basis of that perspective is self-reliance and independent action. I know you've heard these terms before, but the political meaning behind them is of decisive importance in the struggle for our liberation. We as women wage a day to day battle against the most deeply engrained, the most pervasive psychological and social oppression imaginable. Women have been taught nothing but dependence from their first pink dress to the last check from their husband's life insurance policy. Many of us, though, have renounced inevitable economic dependence on men. We no longer accept social dependence in the form of commercial beauty, and intellectual impotence. We cannot allow ourselves, now, to submit to political dependence on candidates, male or female, or on the political parties that perpetuate our oppression, the Democrats and Republicans.

Counterposed to the candidates of those parties is the campaign of Linda Jenness and Andrew Pulley of the Socialist Workers Party. Instead of appealing to women to support her campaign as the road to liberation. Linda actively helps to build the mass independent women's movement, encouraging us to organize ourselves to fight our oppression. It is when we as women refuse to subordinate our struggle to that of a political candidate; it is when we really only on ourselves that our strength will grow and our movement succeeds. It is our fight, and no one can win it for us. We must ask ourselves when the Democrats and Republicans began to address themselves verbally to the problems of women? We must ask ourselves, When was the women's Political Caucus formed? Before the independent education, organization, and mobilization of women in struggle? or after?

We cannot surrender the initiative now. For one: It is neither liberalization nor reform of existing archaic abortion laws that will place control of our own bodies in our own hands. It is repeal of these laws that will leave the decision of whether or not to have children up to us. We want equal pay for equal work. We want equal job and educational opportunities. We want free 24 hour child care service. These demands are undeniably just... constitute between 34 and 37% of the work force. How many women, if these demands were met, would seek economic self-reliance, social independence, and political power? As our economy stands now, well over 6% of the work force is umemployed. What would added millions of active, able, unemployed, and angry women mean for our present system? Inflation continues to rise today while women are forced to work for lower wages. What would equal pay for equal work mean for the American corporate system, which is having trouble even now competing with Europe and Japan. What would women's liberation mean to the economic and social structure of the United States today? These are the questions that show us our main enemy.

The tasks we are faced with in the women's movement are enormous, but our potential for struggle has barely been tapped. Our spirit and determination will never be broken. Our social position and political activity can be decisive. While we welcome the support of any and all political figures and parties to our activities, we must never subordinate the independence of our movement. To do so would destroy our only guarantee of victory.

We should invite Rep. Chisholm, Senators McGovern and Muskie, Mayor Lindsay, and others to endorse and participate in Abortion Action Week, May 1st thru 6th. These actions were called at the Women's National Abortion Action Conference recently held in Boston. Women from all over the country met and decided upon these national activities around the demands: All anti-abortion laws—No forced sterilization—No restrictive contraception laws. Although we at this University have a good birth control program, we should keep in mind that more women from Mass. go to N.Y. for abortions than from any other state; and that we won't reside at UMass forever.

Our contribution to this fight, here and now, is in the best tradition of one of the first slogans of the women's movement: "Free our sisters-Free ourselves". This week's activities, the enthusiasm generated in the 5 college area, and the number of different groups participating today are evidence of the large and growing number of women involved in the struggle. The potential human and material resources of this area are tremendous. Among the concrete results of our efforts this week, I would like to propose the formation of an Abortion Action Coalition to help organize and build the movement in this area. The question of abortion is central to our own liberation, and is clearly the major arena of struggle today. If we cannot control our bodies, we cannot control our lives.

Absurd Dilemma

Health was returning, warm arms were spreading over the wooden benches, bathing in the new sun, maybe spring would start over again, melting the cold snow and shooting up the lawn. People were removing heavy jackets for the first time in what seemed a long time, thinking perhaps about their work, or a friend or where they would spend the next vacation. They read in the paper about the absurd dilemma (argument) between S.O.S. and the concert. It didn't really matter what happened. Whether we were entertained like Romans at the Colliseum or whether we did some helping, who cares? So what if some crazy people got aid or we had a crazy time in April. Maybe an afternoon's concert might have helped us forget it all anyway, like upsetting final papers, a "good" friend who suddenly said-no good, no way, or the dismal fact that the only job for the summer was tended by a rotten factory hand. Didn't we all want to be mindless for a while, too. Coldness-escape-apathy-chills surrounded this new spring. Maybe if there had been a way to support Belchertown more and still have a concert, this spring would have been different.

At last someone would have benefited...

Letters To The Editor

The Budget

To the Editor:

Governor Sargent answered questions concerning cuts in the financial aid budget for the academic year 1972-73. The University and State Communications Council (USCC) feels that certain items should be presented so that the students at UMass will understand the facts of the situation.

1.) Financial aid appropriations for 1971-72 were $1,550,000.

2.) Financial aid requested by the University for 1972-73 was $5,696,650. This was the first time that the figure requests represented the actual total financial need of the students. Requests in the past were only a portion of the actual need.

3.) The Governor has recommended that only $1,550,000 be appropriated for 1972-73.

The Governor has not actually cut financial aid but in fact financial aid next year WILL DROP. With 860 additional students at UMass next year financial aid needs will increase yet the Governor wants the same amount appropriated as last year. This means that financial aid will drop 7% per student next year.

4.) The Board of Higher Education spent $8 million last year for financial aid. They have requested the same amount for 1972-73. The Governor has recommended $4.5 be appropriated.

5.) The Governor commented on his tuition bill. He stated it would generate more funds for financial aid. At the same time his bill would possibly increase the total financial needs of the students. Students with parents earning over $15,000 a year will pay more next year and it is likely that some will fall into the "need" category because there is no allowance made for family size, number of dependents and extenuating circumstances.

Tuesday night the Governor used the political cliche 'I don't know what the legislature will do to my bill.' This is a tactic commonly used by an executive to place blame on the legislature. However, in the past the state legislature has shown more sympathy for the plight of the students.

USCC feels that each student should consider these items in evaluating the Governor's performance. We also urge you to contact your state legislators concerning your feelings on the other proposed tuition increases.

Quabbin

To the Editor:

I was somewhat bewildered when I read the caption under a photograph of the Enfield Look-Out sign in the March 6 M.D.C.

The editor's attempt to cuttingly discredit the rationale behind the planning and construction of the Quabbin Reservoir shows no regard for the importance of this water supply reservoir and its vital role in the ecology of the Swift River Basin and the well-being of the people of Mass.

The dying towns of Greenwich, Prescott, Dana, and Enfield (total population 2,500) were displaced with little protest by, and due compensation to, all landowners. Now, the Quabbin Reservoir and the surrounding lands owned and controlled by the Metropolitan District Commission, serve as a wildlife refuge as seen nowhere else in Mass. Deer, beaver, otter and even eagles now populate the land areas of this reservation, not to mention the high quality fish life living in its crystal clear waters.

Ecological considerations aside, most students on this campus and their families have, for much of their lives, depended on the water stored in this reservoir to fill their every need. At the present time, the Quabbin Reservoir serves 38 greater Boston communities and 4 western Mass. townships. In all, nearly 2 million people depend on this reservoir for their water.

Even with the availability of this reservoir, we are now beginning to feel the pinch of a water crisis here in Mass. as more and more demands are placed on present supplies. Within the last 3 years at least 5 eastern Mass. communities have requested admission to the Metropolitan Water District to help relieve potentially serious water shortages.

We are all interested in ecology, and the merits of a quality environment should be obvious, but not nearly as obvious as our need for plentiful supplies of clean water.

Sylvan Apathy

To the Editor:

This is in reference to Donald McGilvray's letter which appeared in Monday's Collegian. Unfortunately, Mr. McGilvray has a valid complaint concerning the Elevator Emergency Distress System installed in the elevators in the Sylvan Area. I would like to comment on the position of non-involvement taken by Mr. McGilvray. Had he taken the time to approach the proper people through the correct channels with an inquiry about the purpose of the emergency system and submitted possible alternatives to the present system, he might have either had his questions answered or performed a service to his fellow residents in the Sylvan Area. Unfortunately, Mr. McGilvray has been struck with that strange malady that is sweeping across campus, apathy. As far as I know there is one cure for this strange affliction and no one has stated it more precisely than James Brown: Get Up, Get Into It; Get Involved!

SOS

To the Editor:

Recently there have been letters and editorials in the Collegian concerning the tranfer of funds from the concert committee to the newly formed SOS.

As a human being I find the conditions existing at Belchertown a true disgrace to mental health and agree that indeed some kind of action should be taken; but, as a student, I find taking money from the concert committee also an injustice.

True, SOS has received a large amount of signatures from students wanting the transfer of the funds, yet I feel these students have been misinformed. Many, I'm sure, sign the Belchertown petitions in the belief that they are helping to improve the conditions at this institution, yet in truth the money will be used for organizational ends. The funds will be used to start a statewide campaign.

I agree this is a worthy cause, yet why is it that SOS cannot begin an intensive fund raising campaign, just as the concert committee has and must continue to do? Has UMass become an organization to aid all causes and eliminate student desires? A concert would be something for the student, in fact the students' funds would be used for their benefit. The concert committee has tried to reach a compromise with SOS by agreeing to give SOS a small amount of money and co-sponsoring fund raising events with the organization, yet SOS still wants a large amount of the concert money.

I ask-why can't the students who are truly behind SOS join us in fund raising work and replace their signatures with action?

Cynthia Swindell

Free And Responsible?

To the Editor:

In the past many meticulous readers, readers of the Collegian have undoubtedly seen the phrase "A Free and Responsible Press" on your letterhead. I believe that the Collegian is indeed a somewhat free press, but I seriously doubt the degree of responsibility you have achieved in your reporting.

A case or two in point will serve my purpose well. Last Sunday, 3/5, Josh Gordon submitted an article for publication on the can/cup vending vending controversy on campus. On Monday, 3/6, an article appeared which had been cut and edited beyond the recognition of even the authors. The imagination and intellectual "sting" of the article was completely destroyed.

Fortunately for the university community, the article on the can/cup controversy will be repeated in its entirety in a forthcoming issue of Poor Richard's.

One can see, in retrospect, many other such occurrences of over-editing, poor reporting, and unconscious misrepresentation of the facts. When, for example, Ralph Nader was on campus in February some reporter from the M.D.C. wrote that the Cage was filled to capacity. Unfortunately, this representation of that event was far from the truth.

In short, I ask that the staff of the Collegian either live up to its self-imposed motto, or if this is not possible, curtail its operations and leave the editing and reporting to the wire services. If campus news cannot be reported well, it perhaps should not be reported at all.

Greeks Defended

To the Editor:

I would like to dispel some of the rumors concerning the Greek system since many of the hostile opinions expressed to me are, at best, blind opinions not based on experience. In defense of the Greek system I must say that they do not consider themselves elitist or exclusive as has been alleged. They are open to all members of the academic community. Recent efforts by some (in their final determination to reach out to potential members) have brought them on a door-to-door recruiting campaign.

In a large university such as this, campus life is exceedingly complex. Intense involvement and interpersonal gratification which have become the finer traits of fraternity and sorority houses, can provide an outlet from this feeling of complexity.

There are those who would consider the pledging but who dislike the formal ceremonies and traditional rites. There are obvious merits to this type of program. They encourage friendship and interdependence where there might not have been one before. They also encourage honor and moral integrity. Those who cannot stand up to the system usually defect (with still many returning).

Fraternities and sororities inculcate a sense of security, responsibility and above all, brotherhood. These values have been, more often than not, the very soul of their existence. Most houses do not cater to special "interest groups" though one may seem more predominate than the other. They welcome any and all member-aspirants.

Within the structure of the Greek system the new member is given the opportunity to participate in extracurricular activities that are not normally available (or as readily accessible) to the student on campus. Though, there are some disadvantages they are far outweighed by their advantages. The system has had its liberalizing effect.

So if you haven't already been approached then go to a rush on your own initiative so that you will have experience on your side. You will find that joining a fraternity or sorority is a small price to pay for all the benefits that can be derived from it.

Vadnais Trade

To the Editor:

We will get right to the point. For the last five seasons, we have been paying customers at home games of the Boston Bruins. During that time we have watched the Bruins closely, and would like to call to your attention certain facts. Weston Adams, Jr., is trying to ruin the team! We would not make so bold an accusation without proof, and so for the longest time we held our tongue. Now we can be silent no longer.

Consider the trades. First Jack Norris, Gilles Marrotte, and Pit Martin were handed to Chicago, along with a perfectly good pair of dirty sweatsocks. That was not all. Ron Schock, Dan Schock, Tom Williams, Gary Doak, Eddie Shack, Wayne Carleton. The list goes on. Andre Gill Bob Woytowich, Don McKinney, Dean Prentice. Not to mention the local athletes who were allowed to slip away: Rich Hebner, Larry Pleau, Bob Sheehan, Stu Irving, Bill Guild. Last time we checked Hebner was playing baseball, and Irving was playing in the Japanese League.

It really hit the fan, though, when they unloaded Reg Leach for another dandy in a mustache. Something must be done.

Mt. Holyoke-Amherst Orchestra To Perform

By MAUREEN MEISTER

The Mount Holyoke-Amherst Chamber Orchestra will present their third concert of the year this Saturday evening. The program will begin at 8 o'clock in the Buckley Recital Hall at Amherst College and the public is encouraged to attend.

Included in their performance will be the premiere of a work by Amherst professor Donald Wheelock. Two pieces by Mozart will also be presented.

Lewis Spratlan will conduct the orchestra of nearly 50 members. Most of the instrumentalists are students from Mount Holyoke and Amherst; however several others are from the community.

The following day, the orchestra will travel to Union College where it has been invited to perform the concert.

Donald Wheelock's contemporary work, entitled "Three Pieces for Orchestra", promises to be most interesting for students. It will consist of three movements, including a fast allegro, an allegretto which is a little slower, and a maestoso which is like a march. The entire work has been dedicated by Wheelock to Lewis Spratlan for the orchestra.

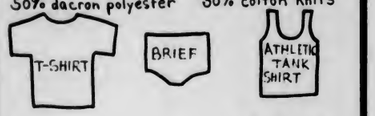
Two Amherst students will be featured in the two Mozart pieces. The first is a lilting clarinet concerto which will include a clarinet solo by Robert J. Yamins. The concerto is written in three movements-one slow movement and two fast allegros.

The longest piece will be Mozart's Divertimento #2 in D major. Wier Chrisemer, who is an Amherst student and a timponist with the orchestra, will conduct the performance. A light, cheerful work, the divertimento consists of a series of short movements, including a minuet. A number of French horn solo passages will also be featured throughout.

WFCR Auction Tonight

The WFCR March fund drive rolls on this week with an auction starting tonight at 8:30. Such items as art objects, tickets to fine arts events, food and drink coupons and records will be on the block.

Bids will also be taken on the art object featured on the cover of this months' WFCR Program Guide, a bronze wall hanging by Greenfield sculptor Homer Gunn. The work is fashioned from sheets of flat bronze and has a musical motif. Among Gunn's other works are the War Memorial in Greenfield, the main gate sculpture at Tanglewood and the entrance sculpture at the Basketball Hall of Fame in Springfield.



The auction works this way: the listener who telephones in the highest pledge for the WFCR fund drive gets the item being auctioned. The Five-College public radio station at UMass is making an appeal to its listeners for approximately $40,000 to maintain its operating schedule.

All-request programs, special shows and other events are scheduled at the station throughout the month. Sunday, March 12, for example, will be virtually an all-request day. On the three major musical programs, any listerner who pledges $15 or more may have a request played if the selection is under 20 minutes.

WFCR broadcasts at 88.5 F.M. to a six-state area and is a joint project of UMass and its four neighboring colleges (Amherst, Hampshire, Mount Holyoke and Smith).

Debate Team Returns With Trophies

By JUDY BENNETT

Recently the UMass Debate Team attended tournaments at Columbia University, Southern Connecticut State College, Navy and Dartmouth. They returned with the top speaker award and quarterfinal trophy from Columbia, the Sweepstakes Trophy from Southern Connecticut, and experience competing against top teams from throughout the country, gathered at Dartmouth and Navy.

Competing at the Columbia Tournament were Karin Kramer, of Levittown, Pa., and Celia Hooper, of Ann Arbor, Mich. Karin was the top speaker in the tournament and received a gavel for this. As a team, the two achieved a 5-1 record by defeating teams from St. John's, Jamaica's, Slippery Rock, Dickinson, Pace, and Merchant Marines. Their fine record got them into the quaterfinal round against URI, where they lost a close decision, but nonetheless returned with a silver mug. Also attending the tournament wre Harry Feinzig of Brookline, and Gary Jakacky of Pittsfield.

At Southern Connecticut, two teams debated off-topic, the subjects this year dealing with legalized prostitution and foreign policy. The teams of John Hogan, Debbie Farrell, and Paul Drager and Betsy Kohler participated in this, each achieving a 4-2 record. Debating "that greater controls should be imposed on the gathering and utilization of information about U.S. citizens by government agencies" were varsity members Jill Peltin and Harry Feinzig, who went 3-3, as did novice members Joel Kassimir and Dianne Petcher. For Joel and Dianne this was their first collegiate debate and they did great.

Taking part in special speaking events at the tournament were Paul Drager, Jill Peltin, and Betsy Kohler. Finally this year UMass brought home the Foley Sweepstakes trophy, which is given out yearly for the best cumulative performance. After six years effort, we had more points in speaking events than any other school attending Southern Connecticut tournaments. The points are given out according to how many events you are in and how well you do in each.

In competition at the Dartmouth Tournament were Paul Lamarche, Dave McCaffrey, Terry Hofmann, and Roger Legendre. Dartmouth is noted as a high quality tournament, with teams competing from throughout the U.S. Of equal caliber is the Navy tournament, which Roger and Terry also attended.

Coming up are tournaments at Wayne State, Liberty Bell, and the UMass Novice tournament, which will be held on campus.

Committee Discusses Tuition Increase

By MICHAEL GREGORY

The Rents and Fees committee of the Student Senate met Tuesday to discuss the upcoming battle over possible increases in fees. Among the issues discussed were the feasibility of replacing professional workers with student help, an attempt to make dorm residency optional for all students, and the proposed Health Services budget for the fiscal year 1973.

A bill filed in the Senate that would urge the Administration to fill all student capable positions with students instead of the current policy of rehiring non-students was tabled so as to allow the committee to come up with guidelines and could be used by such departments as the Physical Plant and the Campus Center.

Another bill, filed by Sens. Stevens and Marshall, would end the mandatory dorm residency for all students now compelled to live in dormitories. The committee voted against the bill with the main rationale being it would have too great a cost to expect the remaining dorm students to bear. However, alternative ways of providing for the end of mandatory residence will be considered and any student opinions will be gladly accepted and considered.

Stemming from the disappointment of the committee to the response given by students to their recent petition drive, it was decided that this Thursday members of the committee will be seeking additional signatures in the dining commons. It is the hope of the committee that they can get another 2,000 signatures.

Student Senate by-laws require all fees to be presented to the committee for their approval. The first of those fees for next year to come before them was the University Health Services proposed budget for fiscal year 1973. A member of the Student Health Service Advisory Board, Sue Keane, presented the budget which called for a $3.50 per semester increase in the current $35.00 fee.

The reason for the increase is the hiring of nine full-time positions and other part-time help. This will help to speed up the waiting time in out-patient service as well as an increase in other services.

The increases also provide for additional dental care as soon as the additional wing is built and furnished. Major improvements will be found in the mental health area, an area now very deficient according to Barry Averill, Director of Health Service.

A major point expalined to the committee was the increased fee will cover not only increases in costs in fiscal year 1973 but also in 1974. After some debate the committee voted in favor of the budget.

Hillel Looks Ahead

"This has been a very active year for the B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation. Brunches, Deli Suppers, Friday night dinners, and Sunday night Israeli Dancing have been successful mainstay programs this year," according to Elliot Margolis President of Hillel.

Margolis went on to describe some of Hillel's planned activities for the rest of the semester. They include a United Jewish Appeal campaign, including a raffle in conjunction with the Amherst Jewish Community, on March 11 "Cool Hand Luke" starring Paul Newman is being shown, and a Friday night dinner as well as a New England Regional Conference at the University of Rhode Island is planned for the weekend of March 17th.

"Hillel has extended its boundaries a bit this year," said Margolis, "sponsoring events with Mount Holyoke and Amherst College such as Cafe Sabre which will be held in April. Also this year Hillel has sponsored a separate Student Struggle for Soviet Jewry campaign and Merkahbah University, a free university of electric Jewish thought."

Hillel elections will be held March 22-24.

The Hillel Center is located in Room 420 S.U.

Brower To Speak On Conn. Basin

Dr. Jane Van Zandt Brower will speak on "The Connecticut Basin--A New Perspective" at Mahar Auditorium tonight at 7 P.M. A film, "The Flooding River," produced by Dr. Lincoln Brower, will be shown. The public is invited free of charge.

Dr. Jane Van Zandt Brower is a director and co-founder of the Connecticut River Ecology Action Corporation (CREAC) and Science Advisor to the New England Coalition on Nuclear Pollution (NECNP). She is an Executive Committee member of the New England Chapter of the Sierra Club and Chairman of its Connecticut River Basin Committee.

Dr. Brower is the author of position papers on issues including out-of-basin water diversions, pumped storage hydroelectric plants, the energy crisis, and floodplain management.

Superchicks And Mod Fuzz

By TONY GRANITE

HEADLINE OF THE WEEK comes from the Amherst Student. It topped a satirical piece on solutions to the institution's fiscal problems. "College Low On Bread, Kneads Dough."

SEXIST ADS are bringing reactions from readers of the campus press. A case in point is the Indiana Daily Student, which drew the ire of coeds with an ad for "Chicken Unlimited."

The text which flunked the test of the WLF said, "Rated X-tra delicious! Even if you're a 'Leg Man' you've got to admit that every part of SUPER-CHICK is indescribably good!"

And the art work was of a curvey chicken dressed in a formal gown.

Kids reacted to the letter complaint by advising four alternatives: (1) write a letter to the editor (which one gal did); (2) cancel her subscription to the newspaper; (3) boycott the offending advertiser; (4) write a letter to the advertiser.

Seems reasonable.

ANOTHER EXPOSE made the front page of Lex, the student newspaper of the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York City, recently.

A pardoy of the newspaper, titled "Less", appeared on campus, produced by a faculty duo who were critical of the administration. They added injury to insult by charging the cost of publication to the Student Activities Association.

A FURTHER EXPOSE is revealed in the pages of the Northern Iowan of the University of Northern Iowa, which is advertising lists of student senators who have demonstrated "irresponsibility" by missing meetings of the Senate.

MEANWHILE, at Central Michigan University, the Life there reveals that the campus fuzz have gone mod on two counts.

First, they call themselves the Department of Public Safety; second, they have recently purchased a snowmobile and sled to patrol wooded areas of the campus.

JOB-HUNTERS at Georgia State are being invited to a workshop titled "How to Apply For A Job," according to the Signal newspaper there.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

Aquarians often are awed by those born under Leo. The classical Aquarian is constantly in search of an ideal. In many instances, Leo seems to fill the bill and Aquarius hero worships. Both Leo and Aquarius can be stubborn. Unless there is plenty of laughter present in this relationship, it could head for proverbial rocks. Leo and Aquarius are drawn to each other and often become business or marital partners or both.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Ambitions can be fulfilled. Be dynamic and inquisitive. Member of opposite sex is involved. Aim high. Don't settle for substitutes. Career receives boost. Your standing is elevated.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Fine for study, adding to knowledge, publishing. Travel plans should be completed. Keep lines of communication open. You gain through one who is at distant place. Key is to be receptive, willing to learn.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Agreement is reached in connection with joint enterprise. Mate, partner play key roles. Some who try to divide and conquer are exposed. Fine chance now to collect what is due.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Obtain valid hunt from Gemini message. Investment seems headed for profit. Emotional involvement should be taken seriously. Stakes are too high for playing games. Get off sidelines and into action.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Conditions at work, home improve. You have reason to stand up and cheer. Vitality returns. Your efforts are recognized. Some who rejected in past now do about-face. You can be happy if you permit yourself to be.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Romance blooms. What may have appeared an insignificant relationship develops into something of value. Pleasure indicated through children. Stress creative approach. Welcome change and challenge.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Property increases in value. Your intuitive intellect serves now as reliable guide. You are able to build on solid base. Security is enhanced. Home life improves. Relations with close relatives will be more harmonious.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Short journey is on agenda. Ideas are developed. You now can envision complete format. Gain shown through writing. Get thoughts on paper. Give full rein to intellectual curiosity. Answers are obtainable.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Financial situation improves. You may be recipient of windfall. Don't permit others to dissuade you. Remain true to personal convictions. Collect what you need. Solid research pays dividends.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Take initiative. Element of timing now favors new starts in new directions. Stress original approach. Be independent in thought, action. Change, travel and variety of experiences are featured. Go to it.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Benefits accrue through group, organization, institution. You can bring together those with divergent views. Diplomacy now becomes valuable ally. Taurus and Libra persons figure prominently.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Accent on transforming hopes, wishes into realities. Friend you aided in past is due to return the favor. Be optimistic. Reward indicated as result of professional efforts. You gain added recognition.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are able to aid those in distress. Your view is large as opposed to petty. You are drawn to the arts, law and medicine. April and August are indicated as outstanding months for you in 1972. You may be much involved with an Aquarian.

Messenger Comes To Central Area

The newest student publication to appear on campus is the "Central Messenger", a four-page, tabloid-size weekly news magazine.

Edited by a staff directed by Cynthia Nadreau '74, the "Messenger" will distribute 1,300 copies of its first edition, March 22, to the 12 dormitories that make up the Central Residential Area. A meeting is scheduled for Thursday, March 9, at 7:30 in the basement of Baker for interested people who would like to submit articles, apply for staff positions, and get ideas for stories.

The publication includes Area news items, as well as items of campus-wide interest. Poems, stories, editorials and photographs will be accepted.

"We're trying to produce a balanced magazine that will not only encourage communication between students and the power structure; it will also provide a literary outlet for students who find difficulty being published in other campus media," explained editor Nadreau.

Financed by the Central Area Council, the "Messenger" is an educational vehicle for students who can earn one academic credit for participation on its staff. Arrangements for such credit may be made through the editor.

"We're not giving away credits, by any measure," she says. "What we are trying to do is to find good people to write for us who would otherwise not have the time. And allowing one credit will help to relieve the academic strain."

IM Wrestling Results

By BARBARA HERN

After several nights of preliminaries in which Fraternity, Residence Hall, and Independent Championships were decided, the 1972 Intramural Wrestling program came to a close last Thursday night when the Campus champions were decided. In what proved to be an exciting evening of wrestling skill and determination, nine matches were held, nine championships were decided, and much cheering was done by the large, enthusiastic and highly vociferous crowd present. Results of the matches were as follows:

In the 128 lb. weight class, Cressor of Kappa Sigma pinned Wiley of Thacher at 3:52 in an extremely close, hard- fought contest. The 137 lb. class was won by Parent of the Spunks as he decisioned Bannick of SPE by the score of 2-0. The win was Parent's second title in as many years. Wilson won the 147 lb. class by forfeit. His intended opponent, Charlie Hardy of Phi Mu Delta was unable to compete as a result of an unfortunate injury received in his semi-final bout. In the 157 lb. class, Hannor, who like Wilson was competing unattached, fought a convincing, determined match but was decisioned by Fyma of Lambda Chi Alpha by a score of 3-0. Castricore of the Spunks decisioned Delmaestro of Kappa Sigma, also by the score of 3-0, in another tough battle in the 167 lb. class.

Carl Liuders of Phi Mu Delta and Kantor of the Maroons made it to the finals of the 177 lb. class. The final match was a close one with Kantor winning a decision from the referees by 4-0. Hazel of the Spunks won by an identical score over Peter Berg of Phi Mu Delta in the 187 lb. class. The final at 197 was won by a forfeit as Mays of the Munchkins was declared champion when Mika from Kappa Sigma was forced to withdraw due to an injury. In what is typically the feature bout of the championship matches, Marino of Kappa Sigma and Paul St. Onge of the Dudes went against each other in the unlimited class. Audience response was particularly enthusiastic here as St. Onge overpowered Marino with a pin at 1:43.

The evening was concluded with the presentation of the trophies. The all-campus team championship was awarded to the Thacher Redwoods to end the ceremonies, the evening, and the season.

Rugby Returns

The mild winter has coaxed the UMass ruggers out of hibernation to prepare for the spring Rugby season. The UMass Rugby Football Club begins this season with a trip to Florida. The University of Florida at Gainesville hosts the Third Annual Gator Tourney. The UMass club was invited along with Notre Dame, LSU, Cornell and Michigan State. The other clubs in the tourney are Spring Hill College, Vanderbilt, and host, Florida. The ruggers look forward to a successful season with more than ten games scheduled, opening at URI on March 18, followed by Vanderbilt in the Gator Tourney.

The UMass Rugby Football Club begins the fifth year of its existence and has grown into one of the stronger collegiate clubs in New England. In the fall season, with largely novice players, the ruggers showed its opposition good hard rugby.

Rugby at UMass is a unique sport among intercollegiate athletic programs. Last fall over seventy ruggers played ball in the UMass colors. The club fielded three sides many weekends during the fall, but for this spring they expect to field four sides. This means that over ninety athletes will play rugby for UMass this spring.

Practice sessions have begun and are scheduled three times weekly- Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Thursdays at 4:30 p.m. The new rugby player, that is, any athlete with an interest in a low pressure contact sport, is more than welcome. Details about rugby and the rugby program can be obtained by simply coming down to the practice sessions in front of Boyden.

NAIADS

NAIADS, the University Synchronized Swimming & Aquatic Art group will have it annual performances on Thursday, Friday, Saturday, March 16, 17, 18 plus a show for University Children on Monday, March 13. The one-hour program will include mixed groups, duets, trios and large groups in Communal Interlude; Yin & Yang; 23; Float Patterns; Straight Line Deviations.

All performances are in WoPE pool and begin at 7:30 p.m. Admission is by free ticket available at the Campus Center & WoPE, March 8-15 from 1-4 p.m.

Girls Lose To UNH

Last Monday, the UMass girls ended a disappointing season with a loss to UNH, 61-49. This game, like so many others this season, was close, exciting basketball through the first half as the unusually high half-time score 31-31 indicates.

But somewhere between the opening whistle of the third quarter and the final buzzer, the UMass team missed the boat and let a probable victory slip out of their hands.

Beth Fay and Vicki Pagel, who have powered the offense all season, came through again to share top point honors with thirteen each. Freshman Pat Glispen played her best game of the season collecting twelve points, ten of which kept UMass in the game during the hectic first half.

Another freshman, Marilyn Ritz, played her usual aggressive type game, leading the defense and adding six points to the final score. Chris Molonea and Jeanne Abrahamson, who always work well together, turned in a decent defensive effort and scored five points between them.

Overall, Coach Farr said of the season, "It obviously has been a rebuilding year for us." (Four key varsity players were freshmen and two of them were regular starters.) She added that, "One major problem has been the lack of bench strength; they repeatedly get mauled in the fourth quarter simply because there are no substitutes."

The JV's were wiped out in their version of the UNH game, as they blew a 28-26 third quarter lead and lost by a 50-34 score. UNH coasted through the final stanza with 24 points to UMass' 6 and gained the win after struggling through three extremely close periods.

For UMass, Sheila Higgins and Sherrie Kowarsky were high scorers with 10 and 6 points respectively. Sue McNamara had a fine game on defense and hit for five points.

All in all, it wasn't a bad set of games for UMass as they gave New England Regional-bound New Hampshire some good competition. The UMass varsity ends the season with a 1-10 record.

Pucksters Triumph , 4-2

Final Saturday vs. Buffalo

By TOM PLANT

For the first time in UMass hockey history, the Redmen will be playing in the finals for the ECAC Division II championship. By virtue of their 4-2 victory over the Merrimack Warriors last night, the Redmen move into Saturday's final versus Buffalo State, who surprised the Vermont Catamounts in that semi-final game.

The Redmen played an excellent defensive game, losing a shutout in the third period, and finished with a near errorless night. The Redmen picked up only 4 penalties in the game, two of which were concurrent with Merrimack penalties, while the Warriors committed ten minors altogether. Some fine work by the Redmen penalty killing squads resulted in virtually no power-play for Merrimack.

The first period began to shape up as battle between the Redmen offense and Merrimack goalie Pat Finch. Finch, who was named to last week's ECAC Team of the Week for Division II, put on a glittering goaltending demonstration for most of the period, as the Redmen kept constant pressure on the Warriors defense. At 5:41, Merrimack's Pete Krussel skated to the penalty box with a charging minor, giving the Redmen their first power-play of the period. Finch robbed Pat Keenan from about 10 feet out, and seconds later pulled off a fantastic glove save off the stick of Jack Edwards from very close in. The continued UMass pressure caused more penalty woes for Merrimack, as they quickly picked up two more minors, giving the Redmen the man advantage for four more minutes of the period. But Finch was unbeatable. Finally, at 18:57, the Redmen took a 1-0 lead on a play set up by Jimmy Coleman. The slinky Redmen center eluded a Merrimack defenseman with a nice move along the boards, passed to Bob Shilalie at the point, whose slapshot was tripped by Mike Waldron for the goal. Finch had 18 saves in the period while Merrimack put only 6 shots on the UMass goal.

At 2:32 of the second period, the Redmen made it 2-0 when Pat Keenan gathered in a pass from Jack Edwards from behind the Merrimack goal, and made no mistake about it as he fired the puck into the upper left corner of the net. Golden opportunities for both teams went by the boards, as Merrimack's leading scorer Barry Wassick, had a clear shot from close in and fored wide, as well, a partial breakaway by Eric Scrafield was snuffed by Finch.

At 13:07, Merrimack's Mark Petit picked up his fourth penalty of the game and the Redmen power play crew turned it on. Edwards and Keenan was the combination again, as Edwards hit the UMass leading scorer with another perfect pass about twenty feet out, and Keenan was right on target again.

Penalties continued to hurt the Warriors as Dave Kroemien earned 2:00 for tripping at 16:32 and twelve seconds later the Redmen were ahead 4-0. This time it was Dan Reidy who tripped it in with assists going to Keenan and Shilalie.

Three minutes and fifteen seconds into the third period, P.J. Flaherty lost his shutout bid when the Warrior's Otto Tingley made it 4-1. Tingley, a freshman, got the rebound of a Scott Cole shot and tipped it over the sprawled Flaherty who never had a shot at the save. Merrimack hit again at 5:28 on a goal by Phil Youngclass, as the Warriors were taking advantage of the characteristic third period Redmen slump.

With only 50 seconds left, Merrimack pulled Finch in a desperation move that is always done in a do-or-die contest, but an extra skater didn't bring them any closer to the high flying Redmen's net.

P.J. Flaherty made 29 saves in the contest, with a great night in the goal, while Finch collected 35 saves in a super-duper performance.

So, the stage is set. Buffalo, a very strong team that was seeded a lowly fifth for the playoffs will meet the Redmen at Orr Rink Saturday night for the championship game. Buffalo has played mostly teams from Western New York and haven't been seen much in eastern New England but the Redmen will certainly have their hands full.

Hoopsters Edged By Maine

ORONO--The UMass basketball team joined the ranks of the "You can't beat the Black Bears at Orono" club here last night as it ended its longest season in five years with a thud, 83-79.

Thus, Maine completed its home sweep of the Yankee Conference and probably bigger to them was the fact that they tied the Redmen for second place in the Yankee Conference at 6-4.

For the Redmen, this is something that has not been experienced in sometime--losing in Maine--and it led Jack Leaman to comment after the game, "It's discouraging to see our program dip so low to lose to UNH and Maine on the road."

The score in itself is indicative of the seasonal trend that has been UMass basketball. "Only one basket a game kept us from having a great season and going to the N.I.T." Leaman said. "And it's been very discouraging the way we've played the last few games."

A good case in point is here at Orono. The Redmen fought back throughout the game from as far back as 12 points early in the second half (56-44) where they were within a point at 64-63 with just over six minutes to play.

This was as close as they came the rest of the way. Another basket eluded the Redmen. Another basketball game lost at the threshhold of equality.

As a matter of fact, Maine expanded this lead to eight at 78-70 with three minutes to play, but the Redmen made a final rush that fell short after given the opportunity to tie or win when the Black Bears missed free throw after free throw down the stretch.

Maine jumped off quickly at 12-7, but the Redmen came charging back to within a point at 17-16 midway into the first half. It was here that Maine left the Redmen for the next 15 minutes with an 8-2 burst that carried them to a 37-32 bulge at the half.

As was anticipated, the Black Bears were not the same team that attempted to perform at the Cage a couple of weeks back. Couple this with a Maine rule that prohibits out-of-state referees for basketball games and the following quote from Leaman: "It's pretty rough when the kids work so hard and have two fellows who don't do a creditable job", and maybe you can see why the Black Bears have been unbeaten at home.

Not to discredit Maine, they played well, especially a couple of guys by the names of John Sterling and Paul Bessey. The former had a game high of 27 points while Bessey chipped in with 18 and along with backcourt mate John Morrison took Mike Pagliara and John Betancourt out of the game for 30 minutes.

Al Skinner continued his consistently good performances in leading the Redmen with 21 points and 17 rebounds.

UMass finishes the season at 14-12.

Dan Reidy scores 4th UMass goal as he tips in a shot by Bartholemew. Goal was merely icing on the cake which gave UMass a 4-0 lead at the time. Merrimack's third period rally fell short giving UMass the finals vs. Buffalo. (Photo by Ann Gurnett)

UMass Grapplers In NCAA

By JOHN BOCK

The Forty-Second NCAA Wrestling Tournament gets underway today at the University of Maryland's Cole Field House. Representing the University of Massachusetts are senior 190-pounder Bruce Buckbee and junior Heavyweight Carl Dambman.

For the fourth consecutive time in the six years that Homer Barr has been head coach, he is taking some of his proteges to compete with the toughest competition in the nation.

Both Bruce and Carl are recently crowned New England Intercollegiate Wrestling Association Champs and thus qualified for the nationals. This will be the second year that the tournament is to be held on qualification basis. Previously, any wrestler that was on the team of a member school of the NCAA was eligible to participate regardless of his performance in his conference tournament. Only the champion from the NEIWA could qualify this year due to a special NCAA rule.

A team championship is awarded each year and for almost half of the forty-two years the Oklahoma State University Cowboys have walked away with the trophy. They are the defending champs again this year, but are definitely not the favorites to win. The Iowa State Cyclones have been number one ranked since preseason and have enjoyed a season marred only by a 17-16 loss to University of Washington, the second ranked team. The Cyclones have two defending NCAA champs and the potential to win two more this year and so they have become the teamto beat at Maryland.

Both top seeded men in the 190 and heavyweight class are Iowa State men. Ben Peterson is big, strong, quick, and confident. These attributes, plus an undefeated season make him a very sure bet to repeat at 190.

At heavyweight is former National Junior College Champ, 400-pound Chris Taylor. Yes, FOUR HUNDRED pounds of undefeated bulk will flatten a lot of guys this year. One he has already beat is defending heavyweight NCAA Champ Greg Wojciechowski of Toledo University.

How do Carl and Bruce feel about the possibilities of grappling with such a twosome?

Bruce, in a reflective mood after practice earlier this week, reflected on the nine years that wrestling has been part of his life and said, "When I was at the tournament two years ago, I was awed by the wrestlers. This year, I don't feel awed but proud and privileged to have earned the right to go, especially after four years of kicking around and feeling at times like I'd never win anything."

When queried about his success this year, Bruce replied, "If I have to attribute my success to any one person then that person has to be Jada."

The Jada Bruce spoke of is his fiancee from Hawaii who was a student at UMass for the first semester and is now back at UHawaii.

Carl Dambman is going to the tournament in disguise as he has shaved his debonair mustache and some of his curly locks to comply with the NCAA hair length rule. This is Carl's second trip to the NCAA's and he is looking forward to it just as much as last year even though he would rather be at 190.

That is only understandable with Taylor one of the 32 that Carl could meet in the first round. How does he feel about Taylor?

"I'd like to meet Taylor in the second round this year because I want to win one this time. Wrestling him wouldn't scare me because I would have everything to win and nothing to lose. If he beat me then I could follow him through in the consolations. I feel that there are only five or so wrestlers that I am really unable to beat and providing I don't see one of those five right away I think I may be in it for awhile."

To talk of the NCAA's and leave out Coach Barr is unthinkable as the Coach was fourth, third, and second in the NCAA's along with losing only one dual match in his career.

"Every year they get tougher. The fish aren't there any more and the balance in each weight class is better. If you want to wrestle and win, you have to be ready physically, mentally, and otherwise. To go is a privilege that you have to work for and that is what Carl and Bruce did."

Hopefully their work will pay off.

SUG Board Votes Itself Control Of C.C. Staff Hiring-Firing

By DON BISHOP

In a move designed to increase student decisional power in the running of the Campus-Center Student Union Complex, the Student Union Governing Board voted unanimously last night to accept a by-law change, which if approved by Acting Chancellor Bromery, would give the SUG Board the power to hire and fire the management personnel of the Campus Center.

The Manager of the Campus Center, Gerald Scanlon, announced at last night's meeting that he will oppose this change, and recommend to the Acting Chancellor that it be vetoed. This by-law change in a sense climaxes recent attempts made by SUG Board to change what they feel is their current status as the supposed governing body of the complex. They believe that they have been relegated to the position of a "rubber stamp organization" in regard to the decisions of Administration and Management.

The by-law change, according to SUG Board Chairman Barry Cohen will, by giving the Board the power to hire and fire management staff, "structurally change the SUG Board from an advisory capacity to a governing capacity with respect to the management staff." Any decision to hire or fire a staff member would always be subject to the approval of the Chancellor and the Board of Trustees.

The change itself comes in Article 7 of the SUG Board By-laws. This reads:

"Personnel Procedures: The Board Chairman will receive from the Director notification of openings of any professional positions. The Chairman will at that time appoint a search committee of not less than three (3) Board members to nominate to the Board the candidates to fill the position.

Procedures for dismissal of a staff member may be considered by the Board in executive session. The Board may, if it chooses at this time, create a committee of not less than three (3) Board members to investigate the pending dismissal. A staff member may be dismissed by a two-thirds (2/3) vote of the Board members. Such actions are to be considered in executive session if requested by the staff member under consideration."

The members of SUG Board stressed that they will not be infringing on the power of the Adminstration and the Trustees in personnel decisions, by adopting this change. The Board apparently hopes to make the building management more responsive to the Board itself and students in general. Students pay the salaries of the management staff through their Campus Center tax. This is included in the roughly 85% yearly operational costs of the complex that students pay.

Chairman Cohen also stressed that SUG Board by this change will not be ruling out management input into the governing decisions of the complex. According to Cohen, SUG Board does not want to interfere in the day to day operational decisions of the management, and they realize fully their non-expertise in this realm.

SUG Board hopes they will not have to fight the Acting Chancellor over this move. They would like to feel that he will be reasonable when reviewing their decision, and be "cognizant" of the discussions that have gone on between Administration and SUG Board over the whole question of the SUG Board "governing power".

Brower Says Connecticut River Threatened By Dams

By LAURA DUBOWSKI

"What happens to the river?" was essentially the topic of ecologist, Dr. Jane Van Zandt Brower's speech, delivered to a very large crowd at Mahar Auditorium last night. Sponsored by C.E.Q. (Coalition for Environmental Quality), the talk presented by the leading New England ecologist, Dr. Brower, was entitled, "The Connecticut River Basin-A New Perspective." Illustrating the lecture was a film, "The Flooding River" produced by her husband, Dr. Lincoln Brower.

The movie and Dr. Brower's speech emphasized the need to allow the natural flooding of the Connecticut River, as opposed to water diversion-which would include dams for both flood control and power purposes.

Dr. Brower's opening remarks included the philosophy that "in diversity there is freedom". She stated that "freedom implies a choice", and that the choice of the future will be constrained by the misuse of what we have at the present. The actions of man today could eliminate his choice in the future.

It was noted that the natural cycle of flooding is becoming over-controlled. Dr. Brower referred to the fact that man, interfering with the Connecticut River's natural floods can change the eco-system on which man totally depends. Natural flooding allows for the diversity of life and for the life cycle to be maintained.

She said that various proposals by the Army Corps of Engineers include plans for the construction of 200 dams on the Connecticut River. Some of these dams would be utilized for flood control. These would serve to keep the flood waters out of the flood plains. Then the flood plains could be used for land development. With the advent of this urban renewal and the hard top and shopping centers that accompany it there would be need of more dams to control the floods. Thus, Dr. Brower explained, there would be a "never-ending vicious circle" of dams to keep back the floods. Dr. Brower states that the development of these fertile flood plains would be detrimental, as the plains contain rich soil. She believes a valid alternative would be the management of flood plains. Wild life areas, land for hunting or hiking, and seasonal recreation were ideas expressed.

Other types of dams proposed by the Corps of Engineers would be those for low-flat augmentation and power dams. Some ecological dangers increasing the temperature of the water and endangering fish.

"What happens to the river" is the concern of Dr. Brower, who along with C.E.Q., believes that action should be taken now. One way to act they said, was to sign their petition. This petition is to protest the plans being developed to divert the polluted Tully River's waters into the Quabbin. The petition circulated after the speech will again be circulated Thursday, March 16 on the concourse level of the Campus Center.

Next Tuesday C.E.Q. will hold a project conference at 6:30 at the Campus Center.

WMPIRG Endorsed by Senate

By MARY SMITH

In late action at Wednesday's Student Senate meeting, the Senate voted to endorse the Western Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group and its funding procedure. The bill further instructs Senate President and Trustee Lee Sandwen to present the petition to the Board of Trustees and move for its adoption.

The bill, co-sponsored by Senators Apostola, Stevens, Rider and Voci, resulted from the WMPIRG petition, signed by over 50% of the student body. The petition calls for the Board of Trustees to levy a $2 refundable tax per semester on each student.

Debate on the issue concerned an amendment proposed after the passage of the original bill. Sponsored by Senator Neil Mulligan, the amendment called for a referendum on WMPIRG to be held before the Senate officially endorses the group. Although half the student body has already endorsed WMPIRG, Mulligan stated that a simple petition was not a valid indicator of student sentiment. Claiming that many students did not fully understand the petition when they signed it, Mulligan urged the Senate to adopt the proposed amendment. Mulligan further reasoned that if the referendum was favorable to WMPIRG, the Senate would then be able to give a unanimous endorsement. The question on the amendment was called and passed.

Following the favorable vote, Senator Bob Chiller made a motion to reconsider the amendment. Chiller argued that a referendum on the issue would only undermine the efforts of the WMPIRG petitioners. Stating that most referendums draw a total of only 10 to 25% of the student body, Chiller maintained that a referendum would actually be a minority voting on an issue that the majority had already endorsed. The question on the WMPIRG petition was called again and this time the referendum motion was defeated. The Senate vote means that the bill will be enacted as it was initially presented. WMPIRG has been officially endorsed by the Senate and Senate President Sandwen will present the petition at the next Board of Trustees meeting.

Sargent's Speech Questioned

The chief reaction Wednesday to Gov. Francis W. Sargent's announced moratorium on state landfill development appeared to be in the form of a question: "What's next?"

Sargent announced a halt to plans for state-developed waste dispoal studies pending a thorough environmental impact studies. He delivered his speech Tuesday at UMass.

In Montague, which has been threatened with a proposal to locate a huge landfill operation to serve the metropolitan Boston area, the governor's announcement attracted both criticism and a note of optimism.

Chairman Donald Skole of Montague selectmen, who was named to the post Tuesday, made it plain he was not all that happy with Sargent's speech. "In fact it kind of tees me off," he said, "because now we don't know what to do-he just put the whole thing off nine months."

Skole said he fears the "buildup of the importance of the speech merely caused people to read something into it that simply wasn't there once the speech was made."

He also fears the delay "could create an apathy in the people who've geared up to fight the Montague plains proposal-but maybe that's what was intended."

"We have our own particular problems with rubbish disposal and if we'd had a definite answer from the governor on some course of action, we'd know which way to turn, but now our own study will just be delayed, and our own plans jeopardized."

He agreed with Rep. Thomas Simons that there will probably have to be changes in the state bureau of solid waste disposal.

Simons said he "hopes the public will be given a chance to take part in the creation of any statewide master plan."

Dr. Frank Kaminsky of Shelburne Falls, a member of the UMass faculty on Engineering and Operational Research and a member of the Montague citizens committee fighting the state landfill proposal, gave a somewhat different view, of the reason for the governor's speech.

"It is my impression that the governor does seem to come around eventually to supporting proper environmental planning, and I feel he has been getting bad advice from the DPW, which has been concentrating too long on landfill and rail haul."

"It may be coming late, but when the public sounds off, he does seem to listen."

Spiro Does It Again

WASHINGTON (AP)-Vice President Spiro T. Agnew strongly defended Greece's controversial regime Thursday against criticism he said was spawned by "the fiction built up by a few dissidents most of whom have Communist leanings."

In comments as he met with six representatives of a Gree-American organization, Agnew said the military regime in Athens is taking very substantial steps to restore a fully functioning democracy.

He said most Greek-Americans stand solidly behind those efforts and that only "a very small fraction...are displeased."

The vice president, whose father was born in Greece, did not further identify the few dissidents nor elaborate on his reference to Communist leanings" as he talked with officials of the American Helenic Educational Progressive Association.

At the urging of critics of the Greek military regime, Congress voted early in February to cut off all military aid to the country. But last week President Nixon waived the ban and ordered assistance resumed.

Hamlin International Center Proposed

By CHRISTINE OLTHOFF

A proposal to make Hamlin House an International Center next year has been drawn by the International Programs Office. The proposal provides for changing Hamlin into a co-ed dormitory and a cross-country meeting place designed to attract foreign and American students interested in contact with students from other countries.

Larry Carpentier, a senior who is an educational administrative intern in the International Programs Office, said, "Many students at UMass would be surprised to find out that there are 700 foreign students here. At present there is no one place for contact between American and the foreign students because everyone is split up in separate dorms."

He went on to explain that most other large American universities provide such a facility for cultural and personal contact between foreign students and Americans, and that many of the foreign students on this campus feel that a similar facility at UMass would aid them in establishing much-desired contact with American students on this campus.

Hamlin House, located in the Quad, is presently occupied by Chadbourne residents while Chadbourne undergoes renovations. However, these students will return to Chadbourne next semester, and Hamlin will undergo renovation beginning in June. It will be ready for occupancy in January of 1973.

Hamlin will then serve two purposes in its capacity as an International Center. It would serve as a place where students from anywhere on the campus could go to meet foreign students and to become acquainted with the different cultures through the media of displays, folk dancing, sampling foreign foods, and cross-cultural workshops. The I.P.O. feels that this would be especially useful for those students who are planning to study abroad.

Hamlin will also be a co-ed dormitory designed to house foreign and American students, both undergraduate and graduate. Carpentier emphasized that the intention of the I.P.O. is not transform Hamlin into a foreign-student dorm. Rather, it is hoped that a 50-50 ratio of Americans to foreign students will result. This ratio would best serve the interests of cross-cultural contact.

The I.P.O. will set up a table this week on the Concourse level of the Campus Center where any student interested in moving into Hamlin next year can pick up a questionnaire dealing with preferred living arrangements, what type of recreation and study rooms would be needed, etc.

Fac Sen Endorses Salzman Hearings

By JIM DEMPSEY

The Faculty-Senate yesterday endorsed a motion to hold hearings on the Ms. Freida Salzman case and received a final report from the Ad Hoc Committee on teaching Loads.

The Senate also heard comments by Acting Chancellor Randolph Bromery on Governor Francis Sargent's address to the UMass student body this week.

A motion which specifically recommends the holding of public hearings on the Salzman case, was unanimously passed by the Senate at their Thursday afternoon meeting. This is an endorsement of a motion presented by Student President Lee Sandwen to the Board of Trustees two weeks ago. The motion provides for an investigation into both the nature and the justice of administration procedures used in this case.

Professor Joseph Burroughs, speaking in behalf of Sandwen's motion, named four administration policy provisions which guarantee this investigation: 1) the right to appeal; 2) the right to academic freedom in matters of tenure and dismissal; 3) the right to an open hearing; and 4) the right to the use of grievance machinery.

Lee Sandwen won praise and applause from the Senate members when Professor Burroughs cited his determined gall and bold efforts before the Trustees. Burroughs said, "He has greater courage of our convictions than we have."

The Ad Hoc Committee on Teaching Loads presented its final report at yesterday's session, recommending guidelines for the future. Included in these guidelines is a 12-hour average faculty teaching load. This refers to approximately seven classroom hours plus the additional time spent on thesis and honors project supervision and other forms of individual instruction.

Professor Robert Wagner, Chairman of the Committee said one of the reasons the Committee was formed was because other states passed laws saying that faculty members should be required to do twelve hours of teaching. He also mentioned that 2 1/2 courses per teacher was the present average here at UMass.

Professor Ellis Olum summed up the feelings of the Faculty to the report when he said "The teachers do not want to take on any new work." Debate on what actions should be taken to implement the guidelines of the report, was cut off.

Acting Chancellor Bromery opened the meeting by clarifying two points made by Governor Francis Sargent when he spoke here this week. The current Student-Faculty ratio was cited by Sargent as being 14-1. Bromery explained that this figure was arrived at by including vacancies and teachers on leave, as well as working faculty members.

Sargent also claimed that next year's budget request was actually an increase over this year's budget, rather than a decrease. Bromery emphasized the fact that this increase would dwindle away "almost to the penny" when inflation, cost-of-living hikes, additional enrollment, and the increased savings allotment are considered.

Bromery also mentioned that the Administration is working diligently on the subject of rent increases.

In other business, the Senate voted to hold a special meeting very soon to hear arguments against the proposed enrollment of the Faculty in one of three national teachers organizations: 1) the National Education Association (NEA); 2) the American Federation of Teachers; and 3) the American Association of University Professors (AAUP).

Last month, three guest speakers presented the favorable aspects of their organizations, at a special Faculty-Senate meeting. In the interests of fairness and equal time, there will be a second special meeting.

The Faculty-Senate approved a motion presented by Professor Solomon Barkin, requesting their endorsement of a State Senate bill now before the Massachusetts Legislature, concerning financial assistance for higher education. This is one of two bills before that body.

The bill in the State House of Representatives provides for financial assistance on a per-capita basis of student attendance. In the State Senate, the bill provides for financial aid according to a cost-educating formula, which would direct aid to institutions where federally aided students choose to attend.

The meeting was recessed until next Thursday afternoon when the remaining agenda business will be taken up.

Innocent Man Sought To Receive Compensation

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — Court officials here have lost contact with a Puerto Rican man, jailed for nearly eight months and then found innocent, who is owed an estimated $1,000 compensation.

Domingo Marrero, 21, whose last address was in Holyoke, was jailed April 15, 1971, and charged with manslaughter in the death of Armando S. Rodriguez, 33, of Bridgeport, Conn.

Rodriguez' body was found along a road in Suffield, Conn. In testimony during his trial in January, Marrero admitted killing Rodriguez with a tire jack, then dumping his body. He said he acted in self defense on behalf of the dead man's wife, Mrs. Ada Rodriguez, and their 10 children, when Rodriguez allegedly visited his estranged wife at her Holyoke apartment and threatened them with a razor and kitchen knife.

State statute provides that a defendant can collect compensation when found innocent. The compensation starts six months after indictment. Marrero was indicted May 18, 1971, entitling him to 48 days compensation, calculated on the basis of an average day's pay.

Because Marrero was a migrant tobacco worker, his defense attorney, chief public defender Edward McBridge, believes Marrero is entitled to about $1,000.

The problem is that Marrero was so anxious to return to freedom after his acquittal that he rushed out of court, with no coat, and has not been heard from since, McBride said. He was never informed of his right to seek compensation, McBridge said.

Marrero had been held in jail because he could not find anyone to sign for him as a security risk. His mother sent $250 from Puerto Rico for the required 10 per cent payment for a $2,500 surety bond.

Irving And Wife Indicted

NEW YORK (AP)-Clifford Irving and his wife Edith were indicted by federal and county grand juries Thursday on charges of fabricating taped interviews, forging documents and engaging in other schemes in a plot to obtain $750,000 for a bogus autobiography of billionaire Howard Hughes.

The indictments spelled out in minute detail how the Irvings and their researcher, Richard Suskind, carried out the alleged hoax which duped two major publishers.

Irving and Suskind are accused of taking turns playing Hughes in simulated interviews of the billionaire, recording their answers and later offering these to McGraw-Hill, Inc., as tapes of unprecedented conversations with the eccentric recluse.

The 24-page indictment charged the Irvings with mail fraud and conspiracy. It named Suskind as a co-conspirator but not a defendant.

The county grand jury charged the Irvings and Suskind with grand larceny, conspiracy and possession of forged documents.

In addition, Irving and Suskind were charged with perjury-Irving for swearing he had met with Hughes in such places as California, Mexico and Florida and Suskind for saying in an affidavit he was present at such a meeting in California where Hughes gave him "an organically grown prune."

Dist. Atty. Frank S. Hogan said the 25-count county indictment alleges the Irvings and Suskind thought they could "successfully defraud McGraw-Hill based upon their belief that Hughes was either deceased or not of sufficient mental or physical capacity to denounce the autobiography as a fake."

The three were arraigned on the federal charges before Judge John Cannella who set next Monday for pleading after Irving's lawyer, Maurice Nessen, asked for "an all-purpose adjournment."

As told in the indictments, the story starts in December, 1970, exactly one year before McGraw-Hill and Life Magazine startled the publishing world with the announcement that they had title ot a Hughes autobiography.

This is the case alleged against the Irvings and Suskind:

The author and his researcher met in December 1970 on Majorca, a neighboring island to Irving's home in Ibiza off the coast of Spain. There they "formulated the scheme to defraud McGraw-Hill."

The first step to bring the hoax to fruition came on Jan. 3 when Irving sent a letter to Beverly Jane Loo, an editor at McGraw-Hill, which had published his previous book "Fake!" Irving told Miss Loo he had sent Hughes a copy and "received a warm response."

Toward the end of January, Irving wrote Miss Loo that Hughes had expressed an interest in doing an autobiography.

At the end of the month, the indictment said, Irving forged three letters in Hughes' handwriting, using as a model samples of Hughes' handwriting contained in the Dec. 31, 1970 issue of Newsweek magazine.

He took these to New York where he met with McGraw-Hill executives on Feb. 10 and discussed with them how he would compile the autobiography.

During those months, Irving also persuaded his wife to help in the plot.

On May 10, Irving altered his wife's Swiss passport, changing the name to Helga R. Hughes and the final figure from a zero to an eight.

He also changed the photograph for one he had taken of his wife wearing a black wig and horn-rimmed glasses.

Thus disguised Mrs. Irving opened an account at the Swiss Credit Bank in Zurich writing the name "H.R. Hughes" on the application form.

They agreed, too , to keep the money intact "to insure its return in the event that the hoax was exposed."

So far as is known, $650,000 was deposited, of which the Swiss have recovered and impounded $422,000. No explanation is given for the remainder.

Four days after making the original deposit, Mrs. Irving went to the home of her former husband's wife, Hanne Rosenkranz, in Wuppertal, West Germany, and stole her identity card. She used it to open an account at the Swiss Banking Corp. under that name.

On May 28 she took 184,000 Swiss francs about $46,000 from the account and gave it to her husband on Ibiza.

During this time, Irving executed a contract granting McGraw-Hill exclusive rights to publish the book and fixing the financial arrangements. Meanwhile, Suskind flew to New York where he did research on Hughes at the New York Public Library, in the confidential files of Time, Inc. and even in the files of McGraw-Hill.

On April 13, Irving met with Miss Loo and with Ralph Graves, managing editor of Life, and on the same day McGraw-Hill gave him a check for $97,500 for advance royalties, $50,000 of which was to be paid to Hughes. Irving had already received $2,500.

To set this up, Irving had spent four days in San Juan during which he forged Hughes' signature to a letter of agreement, dated March 4, 1971, "purportedly granting Irving exclusive rights to write and publish the autobiography."

Irving told McGraw-Hill "he had met with Hughes in San Juan and that Hughes had signed the document in his presence."

On a trip he took with Baroness Nina van Pallandt, a singer, "Irving travelled to various places in Mexico for the purpose of deceiving McGraw-Hill Inc. that he was meeting with Hughes."

There were other trips, including one to Paradise Island in the Bahamas where Hughes then lived, to gather information and to presuade McGraw-Hill that the two men were meeting "when in truth and in fact, Irving did not meet Hughes."

Irving took material from the Library of Congress in Washington dealing with a congressional hearing on war profiteering, where Hughes had appeared, and also obtained material from the Defense Department and the Atomic Energy Commission.

Indians Body Not Tortured

RAPID CITY, S.D. (AP)-A second autopsy on the body of Raymond Yellow Thunder, 51, a Sioux who died last month in Gordon, Neb., showed no evidence of mutilation or torture, a lawyer said Thursday.

John Echo Hawk of Boulder, Colo., an attorney for the Native American Rights Fund, made the announcement and said the family of the dead man is fully satisfied with the results of the autopsy.

Nigeria's Hoodlum Priests

OWERRI, Nigeria (AP)-Police in Nigeria's East Central State have more hoodlum priests than they can handle. Rogues in priests' clothing are plundering churches, duping unsuspecting citizens and even robbing real clergymen at gunpoint.

In recent months 12 priests, 2 nuns and 2 bishops have been victims in and around Owerri, a Roman Catholic stronghold which suffered heavily during Nigeria's civil war.

Douglas Waited For Berrigan

HARRISBURG, Pa. (AP)-The Rev. Philip Berrigan's defense claimed Thursday that FBI informer Boyd Douglas was waiting impatiently for the antiwar priest's arrival within prison walls, with extortion in mind.

"I asked another inmate to notify me when he arrived," Douglas testified at the federal conspiracy trial of Berrigan and six codefendants. He denied any intent to extort money.

Three Killed In N. Ireland Accident

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP)-Three terorist bomb makers blew themselves to pieces Thursday in the accidental explosion of an Irish Republican Army gelignite dump in the heart of Belfast, the army reported.

The explosion demolished two homes and injured three men and a woman in the Northern Ireland capital's Lower Falls Roman Catholic enclave.

A British military spokesman said the blast was caused by a 30-pound charge of gelignite which the dead men were priming in a house on Clonard Street.

The bomb went off as thousands of Protestant workers paralyzed Northern Ireland's industry with a sudden strike to protest the violence that has racked the province since August 1969.

Security forces said the three men injured in the bomb blast were on the army's list of wanted IRA suspects.

Clonard Street is in the midst of an IRA stronghold where civilian police dare not venture and the British Army--which has 15,000 men fighting IRA guerrillas in the north-patrols only in armored cars.

But on Thursday, the troops and local Catholics forgot their mutual hostility as they clawed at the rubble to drag the injured clear.

The three deaths increased the fatality toll in Northern Ireland in the last 31 months to 267-61 this year.

Bill To Fight Diseases Introduced

WASHINGTON (AP)-Congressional authors of the new cancer-attack law introduced a $1.3-billion bill Thursday to intensify the battle against heart lung and blood-vessel diseases-America's leading killers.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and Rep. Paul G. Rogers, D-Fla., said the new legislation is aimed at arresting diseases which annually cause more than half of the deaths in the United States. Kennedy and Rogers are the public health subcommittee chairmen in each branch who guided the $1.6-billion anti-cancer program through Congress last year.

From both sides of the political aisle, other senators and congressmen promptly joined in signing as co-sponsors of the new legislation to provide a three-year upgrading of federal programs of disease control and research.

Current programs against the diseases received $232 million this year, Rogers said.

Under the legislation, there would be community-based centers for screening and education as part of a disease-control program; there would be 15 new clinical research and demonstration centers for cardio-vascular disease and 15 new clinical research facilities for pulmonary diseases.

There would be a speedup in the federal grant process and a national plan would be required with annual recommendations to Congress on money and staff levels.

Federal activities would be coordinated through inter-agency technical panels on heart, blood vessel, lung and blood diseases.

Nixon Favors ITT In Suit

WASHINGTON (AP)-An ailing lobbyist was quoted Thursday as saying President Nixon told former Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell to go easy in a pending Justice Department suit against the International Telephone & Telegraph Corp.

Brit Hume, an aide to columnist Jack Anderson, said he heard of Nixon's alleged role in the case from Mrs. Dita Beard, Washington lobbyist for ITT.

Hume said he confronted Mrs. Beard with a memo she wrote linking a $400,000 pledge from ITT to the Republican National Convention in San Diego and the eventual out-of-court settlement of the antitrust case against the firm.

Hume quoted Mrs. Beard as describing her confrontation with Mitchell at a reception in the Kentucky governor's mansion following the Kentucky Derby last May.

Here is what Hume told the Senate Judiciary Committee, which is re-examining the nomination of Richard G. Kleindienst to succeed Mitchell as attorney general:

"He, Mitchell, said at the party in Kentucky he had received a call or had been contacted by the President to lay off ITT."

"You mean this is what the President said?" Hume said he asked Mrs. Beard, who is now hospitalized with a serious heart ailment in Denver.

In answer to that, Hume said Mrs. Beard softened the President's intent to mean that Nixon wanted Mitchell "to make a reasonable settlement."

Former Republican Kentucky Gov. Louis Nunn, who was host at the Derby reception, told the committee Tuesday that Mrs. Beard collapsed in a stupor during the reception.

Earlier Sen. Edward Gurney, R-Fla., sharply questioned Anderson about where he obtained the Beard memo.

Declining to name his source, Anderson offered to make a copy and return it to ITT officials, drawing laughter from the mostly tense and packed hearing room.

"If a newsman's source can be hauled before the government then the First Amendment is absolutely useless," Anderson said in answer to an accusation from Gurney that the memo was stolen property.

Anderson said that Kleindienst was directly responsible for the failure to carry an antitrust suit against ITT to the Supreme Court and is unfit to replace Mitchell.

Kleindienst, who asked for the new hearings after Anderson published three columns on the ITT case, has denied he played any role in the final settlement which permitted the conglomerate to keep the Hartford Fire Insurance Co.

Despite Aid Cuts Taiwan Defensible

TAIPEI (AP)-The military forces of Nationalist China are, by most estimates, well able to defend Taiwan despite cuts in aid from the United States.

U.S. advisers say the Nationalists' ability to defend the island in the future, however, would be threatened by any halt in American aid and sales credits.

The subject has been raised in Taiwan because President Nixon in his communique with Premier Chou En-lai of Communist China announced that U.S. forces ultimately would be withdrawn from Taiwan.

American leaders have told Taiwan that the withdrawal would take place only if the Nationalists reach some kind of accord with the Chinese Communists. This presumably pleases the Nationalists because they regard an accord as impossible.

Fewer than 400 of the 8,300 U.S. military men on Taiwan are engaged in the denfese of the island. The others work in units related to the war in Indichina or on Pentagon communications projects.

The Nationalist military budget is secret but estimates indicate the government spends about $600 million a year on its armed forces. This represents just under 10 per cent of the gross national product.

U.S. aid reduction already has led to debate within the government over the value of its large armed forces. Some cuts have been made in the forces, but not in military spending.

The army has been cut 45,000 men to 335,000. The navy has remained steady at 72,000 and the air force at 82,000. Some of the savings from army cuts has gone into increased purchases of military equipment from the United States.

Nixon Orders Tight Hijack Security

(AP)-President Nixon has ordered the nation's airlines, hit by a spate of bomb hoaxes, to implement tighter security controls in the tense aftermath of a $2-million extortion plot against Trans World Airlines.

The airlines already had reacted to the plot with taut security procedures and experienced numerous delays as a result. There were forced landings and other delays because of bomb threats throughout the day.

Nixon ordered on Thursday "immediate steps by every carrier to prevent or deter weapons or explosives from being carried aboard its aircraft; to prevent or deter unauthorized access to its aircraft; to tighten its baggage checking procedures, and to improve the security of its cargo and baggage loading operations."

At least two airborne planes had to land after bomb threats were received. On the ground, planes were searched repeatedly, and some were kept under guard in the glare of floodlights.

The discovery Tuesday of a bomb in the cockpit of a TWA plane in New York City plus the explosion the following morning that blew apart the cockpit of a TWA craft in Las Vegas spawned the hoaxes and spread anxiety among airline officials and passengers alike.

There was no confirmation of published reports that TWA was negotiating with an extortionist but had lost contact with him.

TWA officials denied a New York Police Department report that a plane carrying $2 million was sent to Atlanta, Ga., on Tuesday night but that no money was turned over to the extortionists.

On Thursday, bomb scares delayed flights of planes operated by Eastern, Western, American and Delta Airlines.

Arrivals at Kennedy Airport were from 20 minutes to 2 1/2 hours late. At Chicago's O'Hare, departure delays averaged 15 minutes. At Columbus, Ohio, security measures caused flight delays of up to 30 minutes.

A spokesman for the Federal Aviation Agency said at least a dozen unfounded bomb threats had been made to airline offices and FAA facilities in Kansas City in two days.

Security took various forms.

In Cleveland, Ohio, off-duty policemen stood guard over parked jetliners that were floodlighted overnight. An increased number of city policemen were posted at the airport in Philadelphia. In Columbus, Ohio, only passengers were allowed beyond the terminal lobby.

Meanwhile, the International Air Transport Association warned airlines to be wary of a new extortion attempt.

Nader Challenges ITT Merger

HARTFORD, Conn. (AP)-The controversial Justice Department settlement permitting the merger of International Telephone & Telegraph and Hartford Fire Insurance Co could be nullified through a state court suit initiated by Ralph Nader.

Superior Court Judge Walter J. Sidor has not indicated when he will rule on the suit.

Nader, a consumers' advocate, filed his challenge in June 1970, shortly after the merger was approved by the state insurance commissioner.

The state law under which Nader attacked the merger, said to be the largest in the nation's history, regulates takeovers of Connecticut-based insurance companies.

During a Superior Court hearing in January, Nader argued that certain facts about ITT finances and promises the company made to Connecticut officials were not made public as required under the statute.

Nader also alleges that former state Insurance Commissioner William R. Cotter was under political and economic pressure that affected his decision May 23, 1970, to approve the merger.

Cotter, now U.S. representative from Connecticut's 1st District, testified that he indeed was under pressure, "but not political."

The pressure came, the Democratic congressman said, from Hartford area residents opposed to the merger and from brokerage houses and stockholders who wanted to know when his decision would be announced.

A Senate committee is taking testimony concerning charges by columnist Jack Anderson that a settlement favorable to ITT was arranged after an ITT subsidiary purportedly pledged $400,000 to help cover expenses of the Republican National Convention.

Under the settlement announced by the Justice Department last July, ITT would divest itself of several subsidiaries and in return the antitrust suit against the ITT-Hartford Fire merger would be dropped.

Due to the increased number of applications being processed for the fall semester, staff limitations, and the extra burden imposed by quota system, the Graduate School has found it necessary to close the Graduate Admissions Office one day a week. Effective February 25 the Graduate Admissions Office will be closed for business on all Fridays through April 14. Telephone inquiries and requests for admissions materials will be handled on those days by the receptionist in the second floor lobby of the Graduate Research Center.

Hospitals Out Of Blue Cross

BOSTON (AP) — Hospital representation in Masschusetts Blue Cross has been ended after 35 years by a change in the health insurance agency's by-laws.

Robert Sheffield, Blue Cross manager of information services, said the purpose of Wednesday's action was to make the agency "more consumer-oriented."

The by-law change removed the Massachusetts Hospital Assocition from Blue Cross membership. The Association represents 180 hospitals across the state. Twenty-five hospital officials were removed from the agency's list of 111 voting members.

Among the latter were Dr. John H. Knowles, former general director of Massachusetts General Hospital, and Dr. Leonard W. Cronkite, Jr., general director of the Children's Hospital Medical Center.

Blue Cross voted to add to its voting members a representative of the Massachusetts State Labor Council, AFO-CIO.

11 Acquitted in Woburn

BOSTON (AP) — A federal court jury has acquitted 11 defendants in connection with a series of firebombings in Woburn last summer. They were charged with conspiracy to make firebombs and had been on trial for seven days.

Judge Charles E. Wyzanski, Jr., in his charge to the jury Wednesday said that if the prosecution had failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendants should have known it was wrong to make a firebomb, then they could not be found guilty.

The judge also said the cases did not belong in the federal court.

"The charges could have been adequately handled in state courts," he said.

Institutions Don't Reform

BELMONT, Mass. (AP) — State Youth Services Commissioner Jerome Miller says that big institutions for juvenile offenders fail at reform because their inmates are from poor families without "economic or political clout."

"A kid from Wellesley who gets in trouble doesn't end up in our system," he told a seminar at McLean Hospital Wednesday. When the parents of such a child make enough fuss, he's referred to an alternative program, Miller said.

"It's the rejected, not-pretty kids at the other end of the social spectrum" who wind up in institutions, he said.

BBI News Team

BOSTON (AP) — If Boston Broadcasters, Inc., BBI takes over Boston's television Channel 5 from WHDH, Inc., on March 19 as now scheduled, virtually the whole news and sports broadcast team of WHDH-TV will move over to the new station, WCVB-TV, a published report said today.

The Boston Globe said newsman Jack Hynes and sportscaster Don Gillis have agreed to three-year contracts, and John Henning, Bill O'Connell and possibly Chet Curtis are near final terms with BBI.

The newspaper said Hynes and Gillis will handle 6 p.m. and 11 p.m. newscasts Mondays through Fridays, and Henning and O'Connell will handle Saturday-Sunday shows at the same hours. Curtis' role is not yet clear.

The Globe said WHDH-TV's Red Sox broadcasting team of Ken Coleman, Ned Martin and John Pesky will move to WBZ-TV but will remain on WHDH radio, shifting every three innings as in the past.

Gilday Accused by Witness

BOSTON (AP) — An admitted member of a gang that robbed a bank at which a policeman was killed has testified that William Gilday drove one of three cars used in the holdup.

Gilday, 42, of Amesbury, has denied he took any part in the 1970 robbery of the State Street Trust Co. branch bank in Brighton or the slaying of Patrolman Walter Schroeder.

Robert Valeri, 26, was called to the stand Wednesday as a rebuttal witness for the second time. He denied he ever told a defense witness that he had made a deal to turn state's evidence against Gilday and "cop out" on a manslaughter plea.

Valeri told the Suffolk Superior Court jury that he also took part in looting the Newburyport National Guard Armory, shortly before the bank robbery, along with Gilday, Stanley R. Bond, 26, of Somerville, Katherine Power, 23, of Denver, Colo., and Susan Saze, 23, of Albany, N.H.

Both Valeri and Bond are under indictment on the same charges as Gilday. The two women have not been found.

Another rebuttal witness called by the prosecution, Michael Fleisher, 24, of Philadelphia-under indictment as an accessory-recounted how he had met the three men and two girls at Brandeis University in Waltham. The two women were students who were active in war protests and Bond and Gilday were taking courses there.

Fleischer said he told Bond he agreed society should be changed but said he didn't believe in killing or robbing banks to finance revolt.

Gilday has testified earlier it was Fleischer and not he was in a lookout car across the street from the robbed bank.

The state contends that the shots which killed the policeman, who was responding to a bank alarm, were fired from that car from a semi-automatic weapon Gilday had bought in a Dover, N.H., GUN SHOP.

Bank Locked by Man

WARREN, R.I. (AP) — Police said Richard Lavey, 27, recently discharged from the Marine Corps, placed a lock and chain on the doors of a branch of the old Stone Bank Wednesday and then explained he did it because he had been having a running battle with the bank for about two months.

Police said they wanted to question Lavey "to see if there is any charge we can bring against him." But Town Solicitor Pasquale T. Annarummo said Lavey had not violated any state laws or local ordinances.

Lavey said his feud with the bank began in January when the Warren branch refused to cash a check for him because he had no account with the bank. Lavey said he did have an account there "but the computer had written me right out of the bank."

After Lavey produced his bank book, the error was found and corrected, but the bank still would not cash the check. The ex-Marine said it was a fairly large one from a Providence attorney.

Lavey said he took the check to another bank where he also had an account and there it was cashed.

Clear and cold today, with temperatures in the mid-30's. A few high clouds will drift in from the west, but they will be too high, and too thin to do anything. (Besides, they're just drifters.)

The sun is expected to set some time later in the day, whereupon it will begin getting dark. Then the temperature will secretly and silently sink into the teen's. (Watch for Venus in the western sky, it means good luck.)

Towards morning, the sun will rise again, but you'll all be home in bed so it doesn't make any difference.

Bilingual TV At UM

The first Bilingual Educational Television Workshop given at the University of Massachusetts is now underway involving students who want to express themselves through TV in their mother tongue--Spanish. The students follow the same format used in the basic Educational Television Workshop course at the School of Education; the only difference is that all programming and class discussion is done in Spanish.

During the Fall of 1971 a group of Spanish-speaking students, most of them Puerto Ricans, met to discuss the possibility of forming a television course directed to their special needs and desires. One of their most pressing wishes is to become so proficient in television that they will be able to produce TV programs for the Spanish-speaking community.

They asked the two Puerto Rican members of the Media Center of the School of Education--Dr Juan Caban and Mr. Clodomiro Cabañas--to set up a TV course for them. Both Cabanas and Caban have a strong TV background. Mr Clodomiro Cabañas is a Masters candidate and television professional with nine years commercial experience in Puerto Rico, and Dr. Juan Caban is an assistant professor, co-producer and director of "Que Tal Amigos. T.V.", a series of five Spanish language television programs that originated at Channel 24, WEDH Public Television in Hartford during the Spring of 1971.

Student enthusiasm is high at the classes. Each student is working out his ideas for the final individual programs. The short exposure to TV has already proved to be a stepping stone to television opportunity: one of the students has a part time job as week-end cameraman on Channel 40, Springfield, doing the evening news. For most of the students, their lack of fluency in English has been a handicap in other courses, but not in the Bilingual Educational Television Workshop.

Due to the increased number of applications being processed for the fall semester, staff limitations, and the extra burden imposed by a quota system, the Graduate School has found it necessary to close the Graduate Admissions Office one day a week. Effective February 25 the Graduate Admissions Office will be closed for business on all Fridays through April 14. Telephone inquiries and requests for admissions materials will be handled on those days by the receptionist in the second floor lobby of the Grduate Research Center.

Ted Ewters Oregon Prim.

SALEM, Ore. (AP) — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., was entered today in Oregon's Democratic presidential primary election May 23.

Secretary of State Clay Myers listed Kennedy among 10 Democrats, despite Kennedy's written request that his name not be included.

Myers has the power to decide which names go on the ballot, and

The other Democrats listed by Myers were:

Rep. Shirley Chisholm of New York, Sen. Hubert Humphrey of Minnesota, Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington, Mayor John. V. Lindsay of New York City, former Sen. Eugene McCarthy of Minnesota, Sen. George S. McGovern of South Dakota, Rep. Wilbur D. Mills of Arkansas, Sen. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine, and George C. Wallace, governor of Alabama.

In addition Rep. Patsky Mink of Hawaii will go on the ballot by filing petitions.

Myers listed three candidates on the Republican ballot:

They are President Nixon; Rep. Paul N. McCloskey of California, and Rep. John M. Ashbrook of Ohio.

Running The Show

The Student Power issue is back in full swing, especially when it comes to governing the Campus Center and Student Union.

If accepted by Dr. Randolph W. Bromery, Acting Chancellor, a set of by-laws passed by the Student Union Governing Board would allow SUG Board to decide who will fill vacancies of any professional positions in the CC-SU complex. The Board's decisions would be subject to review only by Dr. Bromery. Also, a two-thirds vote of the Board would cause the dismissal of staff members.

We urge Dr. Bromery to accept these by-laws, thus allowing students the right to run the building for which they pay.

Figures brought out at last nights Board meeting showed that 100% of the building amortization costs and 85% of the operating costs are paid for directly by students through the Campus Center fees.

Students should govern that for which they pay. This will be a major step forward in such governance, only if Dr. Bromery allows it. We cannot urge him more strongly to let the students have the power which rightfully belongs to them.

How Politicians Put On Their Pants

WASHINGTON--One of the biggest cliches of American politics is that politicans are no different from anybody else. "They put on their pants one leg at a time." Everyone has accepted this without question, and while I hate to destroy another myth I can now reveal after some very difficult research that politicians are different from other people, at least when it comes to putting on their pants.

The first clue I had to this was when I read a book about Lyndon Johnson and how he dressed when he was President. Mr. Johnson had two Secret Service men hold his pants as he sat on his bed, and he put both legs into them at the same time. This certainly made him different from the rest of us and I decided to pursue the subject of other political leaders.

President Nixon, for example, has his valet lay his pants on the bed, and then the valet leaves the room so the President can make his decision in private. He keeps a yellow legal pad by his bedside where he writes out all the alternatives. Will it be better to put his right leg into his pants first, or will it be better to put his left leg? What will be the political repercussions if Jack Anderson finds out how he puts his pants on? Will the electorate think less of him if he puts his pants on like everybody else? What would happen if he didn't put on his pants at all?

Occasionally he might ask Henry Kissinger's opinion or call up John Mitchell wondering how he should do it, but the final decision has to be Mr. Nixon's. It is probably the loneliest decision that any President of the United States has to make.

When it comes to putting on his pants, no one agonizes more about it than Sen. Edmund Muskie. Since he doesn't want to offend either the left or the right he usually sticks his foot into the center of his pants, this, of course, causes complications as it takes him over an hour to put them on and makes him late for his appointments all day long. Sometimes Se. Muskie gets so angry when he tries to put on his pants that he is short-tempered all day long. His staff has been working on this and hopes to have a solution to the problem before the July convention

Sen. George McGovern has a different problem. He has only one pair of pants and he has to be careful when he puts them on so that he doesn't tear them. Before becoming a presidential candidate he alwasy put on his shoes first. But when Frank Mankiewicz took over as campaign manager he persuaded McGovern to put on his pants first and then his shoes. This changed McGovern's image overnight and he has lost his serious demeanor, and seems much more relaxed as a candidate.

Gov. Wallace, on the other hand, goes through three pairs of pants before he gets one on. What he does is jump out of bed in the morning and he is so excited to get going that he rips the pants as he is trying to get into them. His people have tried to persuade him to take it easier when he's getting dressed, but Wallace says "Nobody, not the Supreme Court, nor those Eastern Establishment press lords nor those Washington bureaucrats are going to tell ne how to put on my pants."

Sen. Hubert Humphrey had been identified with President Johnson's hard-line pants policy until late in the 1968 campaign, and many people feel this cost him the election. This year Humphrey no longer has to worry about Johnson and he has let it be known that when it comes to putting on his pants he's his own man. He has told audiences, "At least now when I put on my pants I no longer have my foot in my mouth."

Sen. Teddy Kennedy refued to say how he puts on his pants in the morning as he was afraid that people would think he was a candidate for the Presidency. But people close to him told me that if there was a deadlock in Miami at the Democratic convention, Kennedy would be willing to put on his pants and accept a draft.

A "Student" Is....

A student, as defined by Webster's, simply means one who studies; a pupil; or a scholar.

Yet, the definition, when applied to the college setting of UMass, or any other college for that matter, is very broad and loosely used. To put it plainly, students can easily be classified according to species. Let's take a glance at a few.

For the social seeking major of ABC courses (so-called gut or Mickey Mouse), the academic week starts on Tuesday morning and ends Thursday evening--he's obviously an advocate of the four-day weekend. His college objectives are to obtain the minimal requirements with minimal effort and without infringing upon his social life. Brand this student the apathetic, got-to-have-a-good-time joy rider.

Then there's the pseudo student, the max muscleman who hauls around a knapsack of books just for the sake of saying: "Hey look at me, I do a lot of booking." The only problem is that he hikes all the way to the library in order to use the reading room as a girl watching station or to get in a gabfest with some of his friends. Naturally, he does take to "booking" since that cum is the basis of his ego. However, his announcement to the world that he studies, is indeed a fallacy. Check out his courses and you'll generally find that they're not exactly brain teasers.

What would a college community be without the bookworm--that crazy character whose life is geared to a watch. And if he studies five and a half hours one night instead of the usual six, his daily efforts went for naught. Facts related to his field of study he'll rattle off with the precision of a computer. But an essay? It's out of the question--his brain doesn't deal with data of that sort. It would take too long for his memory banks.

No offense to Phys Ed majors (there are many dedicated student athletes), but there are a few of you at large who are so obsessed with sports that if you were handled a ballot for the presidential elections today, you'd probably write in Brooks Robinson. It seems that the only obstacle in the way of securing that diploma is a 1.6 cum. But there are allowances made to the exceptional athlete, so long as he produces game-time. But what a waste when his athletic eligibility expires--just another number in the files. And who knows, that sheepskin may be blank.

Hats off to the vet! You have to have a lot of admiration for these guys who come to school fresh from the service. Their world views have already been shaped, for the most part, by the rude awakening imposed upon them in military life. They know what they're here for and they go out and get it. Yet, their ideas may tend to be a little more conservative than others...And where some of them are at odds with other students in their unwillingness to bend, they seem to lead too structured a life.

And how about the "sleeper"--the fellow who abides by the "better late than never" philosophy. Most lectures are such a drag for him that the only thing that saves him from missing his next class (Why bother anyway?) is the alarm that reminds him that the class he slept through is over.

Draft dodgers are a breed of their own. The concept of education is used as a deferment alibi. And if the war in Vietnam were to end tomorrow, they'd probably drop out.

The psychedelic gets turned on by books, just one of many get-high aids. But he has the unique impression that the burning desire for education can be rewarded by dropping capsules to unlock the "real world".

One could go on in great length analysizing the varieties, blends, and different combinations of students. You could probably come up with an encyclopedia on the subject. There's really no such term as the "typical student", just as there's no definite reason for attending college. The role of the student depends on an individual's life style, his goals, and his motivations to those goals.

It is not here to condemn, nor to condone the many types of students. Neither is it proper to determine whether or not they're in the proper context with the meaning of education--if such a term exists.

It is rather here to suggest that we re-examine ourselves individually and seriously consider whether we are spending our four years wisely, whether we have a purpose in mind, and whether we are pursuing it to the best of our capabilities.

Are you approaching personal expectations that you established when you came here? Are you getting the most you can out of your college career? Are you satisfied with the results? Why are you here, and what do you want out of college?

Maybe you're just passing the time, maybe you're not. But whatever type of student you consider yourself to be, make a realistic appraisal of yourself today and find out for yourself whether you're getting the most mileage--it's your education.

Letters To The Editor

Check This One Out

To the Editor:

Town Clerk, Estelle M. Matusko, has once again scheduled a Voter Registration Session on the Concourse Level of the Campus Level of the Campus Center for Thursday, March 16, 1972 between noon and six o'clock. The Massachusetts Primary will be held on April 25, 1972 and the last day that anyone can be registered for this Primary is March 25, 1972. Of course any qualified citizen may register at Town Hall in the Town Clerk's Office during working hours.

The questions that most frequnelty arise, since Attorney General Quinn's ruling permitting students to register where they attend school, revolve around insurance, taxes and residency for purposes other than voting.

Persons who have the opportunity to select between alternative voting residences, as most students can, should make the decision based upon accurate information. There has been much talk that the effect of voting in Amherst will be to eliminate students as tax exemptions, change car registration, deny insurance coverage under parents policies and so forth.

Students should understand that "voting residence" is an independent legal concept from all other legal concepts. Confusion results because often all the "residences" are the same for an individual. Consider, however, the following rules:

Car registration: depends upon license of operator-owner, and business considerations as well as principal garage;

Car insurance: depends upon principal garage (a clue to the principal place of operation);

Tax dependency: who pays a prescribed percentage of the bills for another person;

Real estate tax: where the land lies, and who owns it;

Personal property insurance: who owns and controls the property; who is best able to protect it; where it is most likely to be;

Voting: where a person has a sufficiently identifiable political interest and there may be only one at anytime.

Those persons who will be eighteen years of age or older on April 25, 1972, who have resided in Amherst (on or off campus) for six months by April 25, 1972 (for instance most freshman) amy register to vote in the Massachusetts Primary in Amherst any day at Town Hall or on March 16 in the Campus Center on March 16 or may be obtained from the Housing Office in Whitmore. Remember that voting residence does not necessarily control any other residence purpose mentioned here and that you may always change your voting residence when appropriate.

The Senate In Action

To the Editor:

I would like to thank the student senate for giving me the privilege of attending their meeting this past Wednesday, March 8th. I really can't see how the student population can validly complain of no entertainment on this campus, when there are things like student senate meetings at least once a week. The senate meeting was by far the best example of political satire that I have ever seen and I would like to congratulate the senators on their obviously fine sense of humor. The meeting was characterized by inane points of parliamentary procedure, ridiculous bickering about whose name was to be put on what bill and in some cases, senators speaking neither for or against a bill, but still taking up a lot of valuable time.

However this is all a trivial part of their fine and almost professional performance. Their greatest and most impressive situation comedy was proving to the spectators (audience) that the student senate was in no way a representative body. This was best exemplified in a moving speech by one of the senators. Since there were three thousand seven hundred signatures on a referendum to take last semester for the concert and only five thousand five hundred signatures asking the senate to take $2000 from the concert and give it to SOS, this senator so rightfully concluded that the students didn't want the money taken from the concert committee. I was very glad to see that the senate could mock and fuckup what was meant to be a democracy without the practice that our professional politicians have had. I urge everyone on campus to get down and see the senate in "action". It is by far the best performance of a non-professional acting company that has ever hit this campus.

U.S.A.F.

To the Editor:

The Nixon administration has been trying, with a certain amount of success, to defuse the war in Vietnam as apolitical issue. He has done nothing to stop the devastation; the war planes are constantly in flight, dropping their deadly payloads onto the people below. But the American involvement in the war has become very impersonal, replacing the soldier's bullet with a computer controlled air strike. This depersonalization of the fighting has made the war less of a volatile public issue, and in the mood of relative calm, the military is once again trying to filter onto campus its agents of deception, the recruiters.

Under the guise of free choice these duty bound soldiers come to offer money, training, travel, and other payoffs inducing you to join them in waging war against the people of Indochina. The military must not be allowed onto campus to bribe people into being the cannon fodder for the war. The recruiters have no "right" to be here. The military - Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marines - is an organization that oppresses its own soldiers by denying them their basic democratic rights, and programs the massive destruction of Indochina. It has no "right" to send its recruiters onto the campus.

Air Force recruitment is exceptionally noxious, not only because the Air Force has assumed the major fighting role in the war, but also because anyone accepting their bribes may be asked to perform criminal acts. The international laws of the Geneva Convention of 1949, the Hague Convention of 1907, and the Nuremburg principles are binding on all U.S. citizens, laws which the Air Force has continually violated. In the wanton bombing of villages and hamlets throughout Indochina, in the use of chemical and biological poisons, and in the callous disregard for human life (by use of wide area anti-personnel bombs) the Air Force has been acting against international law, forcing its pilots to perform criminal acts. The university must not condone such gross violation of law and morality by allowing recruiters to appear on the campus.

The Student Mobilization Committee opposes any military recruitment at the university. We support the actions of the UMass Boston VVAW in preventing military recruiters from appearing on the Boston campus. And we in the S.M.C. will not tolerate any attempt by the military recruiters to jeopardize the lives and morality of the students on this campus.

Attention!

As in previous years the MDC will continue to print letters to the editor. The only requirements are that they be typed at sixty spaces, double-spaced and absolutely no longer than two pages in length. All letters must be signed and the author's address and telephone numbers must be included. No letter will be published without this information. Also, no letters will be printed without the name of the author. Please note this change in policy.

All letters are subject to editing either for content or space according to the judgment of the editors. Also, due to space limitations, we do not guarantee that all letters will be printed.

Editorial Points

How many people will have to fall on their ass or break their neck (or both) before the University does something about the obstacle course just off of Eastman Lane, by the Sylvan Dorms? The "Hump" (as some area residents so foppishly call it) has been no laughing matter since the beginning of winter, yet continues it's dangerous existence. Since this is the year for spending money, why not just start a student helicopter service?

It seems that everybody knows what your money should be doing but you. Maybe somone will rally a petition to give it back to you (hopefully before it's all gone). Alas, Poor Student Activities Fee; I knew him well?

So far, there have been nothing but good reports about this weekend's Black repertory production, "Natural Man." The word is that it's something you won't want to miss. Everything is everything.

If everyone was truly ecology-minded as they professed, they would stop contributing to the every growing mudbath here at UMass, stick to the sidewalks, and allow grass and dandelions to bloom again.

3rd Party Movement

To the Editor:

A third party is coming into being in Amherst. A group of interested people, who were present at Ken Kesey's recent talk at Amherst College, held their first meeing Friday, March 3. A sauna bath and roll in the fresh snow began the evening so that people could get to know each other. Among those present were persons originally chosen by popular vote at the Kesey gathering.

The group decided to initially involve themselves with local politics, using both the vote and popular pressure to implement our programs. In discussing a platform, we focused on four issues: Community Control of Police, Growth Control, Women's Issues, and Decent Housing.

We are holding an official Birthday Party for the new party imminently. We will decide on specific platforms and tactics, and will name ourselves. Eric Walgren, a member of the group who was elected a co-chairman at Kesey's talk, wants to call us the "Rabbit Party".

Anyone interested in the party should contact Eric Walgren at 253-3006 or Judy Styliano, 586-3254, or write care of the Universal Life Church of UMass, RSO #902, Campus Center, UMass, Amherst 01002.

Gross Injustice

To the Editor:

Wednesday night, the Student Senate acted as a true representative of the student body. It refused to sanction a referendum to allow the students to express their views on WMPIRG's two dollar tax.

This action followed a heated debate which lasted more than an hour and brought out the fact that students had been known to sign blank petitions without as much as a question as to their purpose. Therefore, some senators felt that, since it would entail a two dollar tax which must be paid before a student is allowed to REGISTER, the only true democratic method to determine the true opinion of the student body would be to hold a referendum on the question.

The senators opposed to the referendum argued that the students had already voiced their opinions by signing the original petition. However, we feel that if WMPIRG in truth has the students' support, then they should favor a referendum (which they, in fact, strongly opposed) since a referendum would only serve to strengthen their stand when the petition is presented to the Board of Trustees. If, however, many of the signatures on the petition were signed without due consideration, and the students wished to reconsider, then they should have the opportunity to do so.

A referendum will also be the first chance that those opposed to WMPIRG and the entailing two dollar tax have to express their opposition.

Therefore, we strongly urge you, whether you support WMPIRG or not, to correct the gross injustice done by the Senate on Wednesday night by signing the petition (which will be circulated in the next couple of days) forcing the Student Senate to hold the referendum. We also strongly urge you, whatever your views, to express them and VOTE when the referendum is held.

Program To Advise Future Transfers

The 1150 transfer students new to UMass next fall will be faced with several problems, including the transition from a small school to a large one and the possible loss of academic credits earned thus far at other schools.

To minimize such problems, about 80 representatives of UMass, state colleges and state community colleges conducted a curriculum articulation seminar at UMass recently. At the seminar, the representatives discussed working toward cooperative programs beneficial to transfer students throughout the state colleges and universities.

Welcoming the group were Acting UMass Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery and Acting Vice-Chancellor of Student Affairs Robert W. Gage.

Dr. Ernest W. Beals, UMass director of transfer affairs, said his office hopes to help transfer students with a smoother transition to the larger four-year institutions. According to Dr. Beals, there will be 47,085 student vacancies in state and other colleges and in universities in Massachusetts in fall, 1972,-10,000 of these vacancies reserved for transfer students.

Of the 10,000 transfers, 2650 or 26.2 per cent will enroll in UMass, Southeastern Massachusetts Technical University and Lowell Technological Institute, and 19.7 per cent or 1985 will enroll in nine four-year state colleges.

Cagey Hawk Snatches Hats

HIGHLAND PAR, Ill. (AP)-An elusive re-tailed hawk that has been swooping from trees and snatching hats has divided this community on Chicago's North Shore.

Police and some residents fearful of children being injured, want the bird destroyed. Other residents, who have fed the predator from their back doorsteps, protest the death penalty. No injuries have been reported.

Michael Lichtwalt, animal warden of Highland Park, said attempts to capture the hawk have been futile and there may be no choice but to shoot the bird.

"He's too smart for traps," Lichtwalt said. "Evidently, he's been caught before. He stays away from them. Even to shoot him might be difficult. He flies a wide and extensive range, usually hitting the same spots; but his times vary."

Lichtwalt said he's one of several persons who have been victimized by the bird during the last month. He said the bird dived from a tree, snatched his fur trimmed leather cap and dropped it about a block away.

Highland Park police records show three similar incidents reported by citizens.

More Jets To Vietnam

SAIGON (AP)-U.S. fighter-bombers raided antiaircraft positions in North Vietnam for the eighth straight day, the U.S. Command reported Thursday.

The U.S. Command said Air Force F4 Phantoms bombed antiaircraft artillery sites Wednesday at two locations about a mile apart inside North Vietnam's half of the demilitarized zone and at another point about 40 miles north of the zone. It claimed the enemy fired on unarmed reconnaissance planes.

The results of the strikes, the command said, were not known, but there was no damage to the American planes.

The command has a policy of not disclosing the number of fighter escorts with each reconnaissance plane. Other sources said the latest attacks were carried out by flights of two to four F4s each.

Each raid is counted by the command as one protective reaction strike even though more than one plane participated. The U.S. Command has reported 90 such raids this year.

In a delayed report, the command said one F4 was shot down Tuesday by ground fire while attacking North Vietnam's Ho Chi Minh trail in southern Laos. The two crew-men are missing, the command said.

U.S. B52 bombers continued to pound the northern region of South Vietnam below the demilitarized zone, in an area 31 miles southwest of Da Nang, and in the central highlands.

Sources said the bombers' missions were against suspected enemy troop concentrations, infiltration routes and base camps in an effort to slow down what American officials say is a continuing buildup by the Communist command.

In another development, the aircraft carrier Kitty Hawk arrived off the Vietnamese coast, bringing the U.S. 7th fleet's carrier force to four. It marked the first time since November 1970 that the fleet has had four carriers committed to the war, although only two of them now are engaged in air operations over Indochina.

WE HAVE
uplifting
SOLUTIONS TO EVERYDAY PROBLEMS.

In this instance, we are lifting a complete house to demonstrate a new concept of aerial delivery of assembly line-produced dwellings from factory to homesite.

But . . . this same Sikorsky® helicopter could have been effecting a rescue mission off a wallowing tanker in a North Sea gale. It could have been airlifting food and supplies to starving villagers in flood-ravaged Tunisia . . . or transporting equipment for on-the-spot control of off-shore oil pollution.

Obviously, what we're pointing out is the impressive record and adaptability of our helicopters in solving really important human problems.

There's much more to come in our world of exciting, advanced VTOL aircraft systems. For example, Heavy-Lift Skycranes® and Tilt-Rotor Transports. And just around the corner are our High-Speed Commercial Transports—designed to ease short-haul mass transportation headaches.

Does this kind of engineering attitude stir your sense of responsibility and imagination? Then you should talk careers with us. There's ample opportunity for innovation in: autonavigation systems • avionics • computer technology • electronic test • materials engineering • mechanical analytical design • structures engineering • systems analysis . . . and more.

Female, minority group and veteran applicants especially welcome.

Consult your College Placement Office for campus interview dates—or—write to Mr. Leo J. Shalvoy, Professional and Technical Employment.

Even More Legislators Listed (con't)

Yes, the list goes on, there's a lot of towns. Anyway the University and State Communications Council and the Collegian do urge you to find out who your legislators are and tell them how you feel. More on Monday.

Create a jail cell.

We've done it.
Not because we like prisons, but because people live in them and we design for people.
We're a college called Parsons School of Design, part of a University called The New School for Social Research.
Our students and faculty worked with the city to design the cell blocks in the new Women's House of Detention, here in New York.
In fact, we have an entire program devoted to Urban Design, part of our Department of Environmental Design. It's taught by professionals who are truly concerned with social, cultural, and ecological design problems.
Our students have designed drug treatment centers, mental hospitals, zoos, parole offices, slum renovation projects and an awful lot of private homes.
We teach communication design, environmental design, illustration, fashion design and the fine arts. If using your vision to make ideas work interests you, Parsons is something for you to think about.

This coupon will get you a catalog and an application.
Transfer students with one year of liberal arts and one year of studio credit can complete their BFA degree in two additional years.

Health Services

Infirmary Can Use You

'Now just a minute. When I went to bed last night I put those sugar cubes right out here in the middle of the coral so I would be sure to find them this morning. Where the hell did all this white stuff come from?" (MDC photo by Alan Heath Chapman, Horse Staff).

Q. How can I get involved in the Health Services?
A. Students have two vital means of participating in the Health Services - the Student Advisory Board and the Student Interview Panel.
Q. What is the Student Advisory Board?
A. The Student Advisory Board is made up of students, undergraduate and graduate, who meet with representatives of the Health Services staff.
Q. What does the Advisory Board do?
A. The Board members

1. participate in policy-decision-making activities;
2. express complaints, suggestions, and questions they have received from other students;
3. participate in projects that benefit the student body. Some of these projects include:

-expanding the route of the infirmary car to all areas of campus;
-setting up an information table and suggestion box in the Campus Center last fall;
-working on the new budget proposal for the health Services;
-working on the new Student Health Insurance policy;
-increasing the visiting hours for inpatients;
-organizing a student evaluation of care at the Infirmary;
-starting this weekly Health Education column in the Collegian.

Some future projects are being planned, including:

-starting a display and suggestion box in the Infirmary lobby;
-sending a representative to the American College Health Association meeting in Atlanta, Georgia, in April, to exchange ideas with other Health Services.

Q. What is the Student Interview Panel?
A. The Interview Panel allows for student participation in the selection process for new staff members. Four or five members meet with each candidate for an informal discussion. The students then have a chance to evaluate his or her qualifications (i.e. Will this person work well with students? or Is the applicant willing to consider issues that are important to students?) The students' evaluations are considered along with those of the professional staff.
Q. Are the Student Advisory Board and the Student Interview Panel open to any student?
A. Yes. The groups should represent as much as possible the interests of the entire student body. Both groups welcome new members.
Q. How can I join these Student groups?
A. The Student Advisory Board meetings are published in the "Notices" in the Collegian. All Students are invited. If anyone wants to find out more about the Advisory Board or the Interview Panel, this information is available at the Health Education Office, Room 251, at the Health Services (545-2492).

Any orthopedic devices which you are no longer using? Would you like to donate them to a good cause?

The Physical Therapy Department at the Health Center (Infirmary) is starting a free loan service for its patients who can't afford items which the health fee does not cover.

If you can help, bring the items to the Infirmary - Second Floor - Physical Therapy Department.

Baha'i New Year

March 21st is the first day of the year, according to the calendar of the 110 year old Baha'i World Faith. It is celebrated in over 56,000 localities, by peoples the world over. The beginning of spring is a time of happiness, hope, and expectation: the renewal of life to the cold and dormant earth. This year, the week of March 13th to the 18th has been designated: IT'S A NEW DAY!, and will feature daily evening talks, on diverse topics, in the Campus Center at 7:30; Saturday the 18th will be a joyous day-long celebration of UNITY and FAITH. The purpose? to share the positive messages of the Baha'i Faith. Many have found the teachings of BAHA'U'LLAH, its Founder, and their effects, like a bright light shining into a dark room: brilliant, logical and relevant. Like the spring, they bring life, but inwardly to our hearts and lives. You are invited drop in to the weekday talks, and on Saturday's day-long festival of the springtime of a New World Order, and a New Race of Men. A world- wide springtime of UNITY, and JUSTICE on our tired earth. There will be music, talk, and refreshing new films. Race, class, age, are all artificial barriers clouding essential Unity: "The earth is one country, and mankind its citizens." (Baha'u'llah) For more detailed information drop in at the "NEW DAY" booth in the S.U. lobby. Be Happy!

Juilliard String Quartet To Perform Here

The Juilliard String Quartet will appear at UMass for the sixth consecutive season, at 8 p.m. Friday, March 17, in Bowker Auditorium.

The engagement is the fourth of five concerts in the 1971/72 UMass Fine Arts Council Chamber Music Series.

The Quartet will perform Luigi Cherubini's Quartet No. 1 E flat major, an 18th Century work infrequently heard in concert doay; String Trio, Opus 20 (1927) by Anton Webern, and Johannes Brahms' Quartet in A minor, Opus 51, No. 2. This program, typical of those being presented by the University's Fine Arts Council, combines major works of the contemporary period, a staple from the traditional repertoire, and a relatively unknown work.

The Juilliard String Quartet includes in its membership Robert Mann, first violin; Early Carlyss, second violin; Samuel Rhodes, viola; and Claus Adam, cello. The Quartet schedules concerts throughout the United States, Europe, and Great Britain, and is also resident quartet of The Library of Congress, Washington, D.C., where the members perform a major series for the nation's capitol and an even larger international radio audience. In addition, members of The Juilliard Quartet are members of the faculty of The Juilliard School in New York where they give private instruction and coach chamber music ensembles.

Reserved tickets are available by contacting the UMass Fine Arts Council Office, 125 Herter Hall. Remaining tickets will be available at Bowker Auditorium one hour before the concert.

A telephone reaching both ticket offices is (413) 545-0202. Ticket prices for this concert are $1 for UMass undergraduates; $2 for other full-time students; $3 for UMass faculty-staff, and $3.50 for the general public.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

by SYDNEY OMARR

A reader named Peggy writes from Oakland, Calif., to inform me: "It is always best to criticize Virgo and to flatter Leo and Libra. I make this a rule of thumb," she says, "and it always works." Keep it up, Peggy. Virgo can take it and Leo and Libra deserve it.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You make money doing what you like to do. Prestige is enchanced. You get what you need. Family member makes peace. Gift purchase now would work wonders. /Act accordingly. Taurus and Libra are involved.

TAURUS (April 20-May20): You get action. Your works are received, even acclaimed. Be confident and original. Adhere to your own style. Pisces person understands. Take care in traffic and around electricity.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Persons you may have given up on make appearance. And they let actions speak louder than words-on your behalf. Older individual lends benefit of experience-and capital. You're going places.

CANCER (June21-July 22): Friend can show you the way. Be receptive. Don't force issues. Accent on finishing, completing project. Legal transaction is featured. You are concerned with area of marriage, partnership. Protect interests.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You get aid from one who served you in past. Be independent without being arrogant. Dance to your own tune, but show appreciation to loyal individual. Another Leo figures prominently.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept.22): Creative forces break through to surface, you gain through change. Travel, variety. Relations with opposite sex are intensified. Nothing occurs halfway. It's apt now to be all or nothing.

LIBRA (Sept. 23 Oct.22): Emphasis on who owns what--and you may come out with more than anticipated. Remain flexible. Element of timing favors your efforts. Be aware of proberty rights and values. Sagittarius may be involved.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Be active. Make contacts. Send messages. Your efforts will be well received. Know this and act accordingly. Short journey could provide key to advancement. Ask and answers now can be provided.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec.21): Money area is activated. Efforts bring favorable results. Key is to get going. Delay now would be error. Time is right. Long-standing debt could be repaid. Investigate. Find reasons why.

CAPRICORN (Dec.22-Jan. 19): Puzzle pieces fall into place. Family harmony can be restored. Your views are vindicated. Be a gracious winner. Personal magnetism soars. You get what you want. But be sure you know what is really needed.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): See throug pretense. Get to heart of matter. Check leases. Promises should be committed to writing. Secret agreement is spotlighted. Be prepared. Obtain expert counsel. Don't be you own lawyer.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Friends who had disputs are reunited. You are likely to play key role. Emphasis on gain. Those in positions of authority bestow favors. There is no need for shyness. Stand up and be counted.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are creative, a natural innovator. This year features opportunity through change and travel. If single, relationship could lead to marriage. Married or single, you will be happier. March and December will be outstanding months.

There will be a very important meeting of the Third World Alliance meeting on Monday, March 13, 1972 at 7:30 P.M. at SBA 120.
This meeting will deal with the proposed organizational structure for the Alliance; it will report our constituent progress from the last general meeting of February 2, 1972; it will attempt to define priorities of concern. And it will identify work assignments in accordance with those who have volunteered their time for responsible participation.
THE PRESENT IS A TIME OF STRUGGLE; THE FUTURE IS OURS.

Swimmers Third In YanCon

Swimming and snowstorms don't usually go together except if it's the Saturday of the Yankee Conference Swimming Relyas, as this past Saturday was. But the cold outside didn't seem to affect the heated competition inside. The Yankee Conference in swimming is made up of teams from UConn, Holy Cross, Maine, UNH, and Vermont, and UMass.
The first event was the 400 yard freestyle relay. THE TEAM OF Peter Ouellete, Dick Blaisdell, Ian Emberson, and Jack Tyler put forth a good effort taking third for the Redmen.
In the 400 yard backstroke relay, Bob Okolita, Kevin McGinn, George Kwicien, and Captain Herb Schuster swam hard to take a second third place.
UMass took another third place in the 500 yard crescendo relay with the team of Tyler, Ouellete, Blaisdell, Dick Hagins, and Joe Hebert. The 500 yard crescedo is a freestyle relay in which the first swimmer swims 50 yards, the next 100 yards, then 200 yards, 100 yards, and 50 yards.
Kwicien, Okolita, Schuster, and Tom Smith took a fourth for UMass in the 200 yard medley relay, which is 50 yards each of backstroke, breaststroke, butterfly and freestyle.
In the one meter and three meter diving, UMass divers Mike Queen and Dick Hagins took two thirds. The relay diving, however, differs from the usual dual meet competition where each diver competes individually, doing six dives at each height. In relay diving, two competitors from each team perform three dives at each height, and the team score is the total of the two divers.
The next event was the 400 yard individual medley relay, where each swimmer swims one length each of butterfly, backstroke, breaststroke, and freestyle. Taking fourth place for UMass were McGinn, Schuster, Okolita and Smith.
In the 200 yard freestyle relay, Ouellete, Hebert, Blaisdell, and Emberson took still another third place.
The final event of the meet was the 400 yard medley relay in which Kwicien, Smith, Emberson, and Ed Johnson took fourth place.
In the final results, UMass took third place in the Yankee Conference, bowing to strong teams from UConn and U Vermont. Unlike dual competition, a relay meet depends upon a lot of team effort. It's not the individual performances which count, but the combinations of winning individuals, and UMass displayed great team effort.

ChiSox Threaten To Strike

SARASOTA, Fla. (AP)-The Chicago White Sox voted unanimously Thursday 31-0, to strike unless the major league club owners come up with an acceptable increase for the players' current pension agreement expiring March 31.
The strike vote was the first taken by a major league team this spring and followed a 90-minute meeting with Marvin Miller, the executive director of the Major League Baseball Players Association.
Miller said the cost of the medical portions of the pension plan had gone up $105,000 annually and the owners in January had agreed to pay the increase. However, he said in a meeting Wednesday in Tampa, "the owners reneged on the agreement and instead are willing to pay an overall $250,000, which is $17,000 less than the annual cost of the medical plan that has been in effect the last three years."
Miller said the strike could take several forms and could be "no work after March 31" or "they could take every Saturday afternoon or Monday night off-or refuse to play in any other game scheduled for national television, including the All-Star game."
Miller, who has won more than $13 million in player benefits since taking office in 1966, charged that the owners by reducing their offer were "deliberately trying to provoke a players strike."
Miller intends to poll by telephone the six clubs he has already visited by telephone and the remaining 17 presumably will vote when Miller arrives in their camps on his annual spring tour.

Mitchell Leads Golf

ORLANDO, Fla. (AP)-Balding, drawling Bobby Mitchell boted through blustery winds with a 6-under par 66 Thursday and established the first round lead in the $150,000 Florida Citrus Open golf tournament.
The 29-year-old Mitchell, a pro since he was a 15-year-old in Danville, Va., held a one-stroke lead over big Chris Locker, one of the last to finish in the cook, gusty wind.
Lee Trevino, still seeking his first victory of the season, headed a quartet tied at 68, 4-under par on the 6,877-yard Rio Tinar Country Club course.
"I made some putts-I've got the right speed and they're starting to fall," said Trevino, who has been plagued with a balky putter most of the season.
He was tied with Babe Hiskey, Jerry Abbott and veteran Tommy Aaron.
Gary Player, the South African who always ranks as a major threat in any event he enters, headed a group of a half-dozen at 69, three strokes back.
Also at that figure were George Johnson, rookie Allen, Miller, Jerry McGee, veteran Tommy Bolt and Rod Funseth.
Jack Nicklaus, 59-year-old San Snead and Masters champion Charles Coody were in another big group at 70.

Cooney To Lift At Cornell

This weekend Cornell University will provide the auditorium for the top college weightlifters in the country. The National Collegiate Championship, held once a year, marks the high point of the season for those olympic lifters who are undergraduates in a four year institution. The Collegiates are tough, not only for the high qualifying total necessary to compete, but also for the pressure foundi in a national meet.
Doug Cooney, a junior, will be the only entry from UMass. This is the first time in the history of UMass that someone will wear Redmen colors in the National Collegiates and in the olympic lifts.
Although this will be the first time in National Competition for Doug, he is well known among the New England circuit. As a fresman Doug captured the Junior New England AAU championship, bringing the title back to UMass.
The weekend is March 11-12 and the stage is Cornell University in Ithaca, N.Y. There the best collegiate weightlifters will do battle. It is there that UMass' lone entry will be vying for the crown.

Doug Cooney

Women's Crew

A well attended meeting was held Wednesday night to discuss specific proposals concerning Women's Rowing. Varsity Coach Mike Faherty conducted the session which began with a discussion of the various problems the group would face in the first year. Women's swimming coach Pat Griffin, Freshmen crew coach Charles Leonard, and Roger Williams, a surgeon in the Air Force stationed at Westover, expressed interest in working with the neophyte organization. The possibilities of a spring racing schedule and participation in a women's nationals were discussed. The Women's Collegiate Championship to be held for the first time this spring in Connecticut will feature over 20 schools including Smith, UPenn, Columbia, Princeton, URI, Williams and Trinity.
The following schedule of events for the next few weeks was established to orient all those interested in the sport of rowing. The WoPE tank room #9 will be open Monday thru Friday from now until vacation between 9-11 a.m. and Monday, Wednesday and Thursday nights 6-7:30 p.m. Instruction in rowing on the tank will be given and suggestions as to a physical fitness program outlined. On Sunday, April 9, an open house for all women will be held at the UMass boathouse in Hadley. Transportation will be provided. Any women interested in receiving more information or getting involved in rowing should attend some of the tank sessions. Everyone is invited--no experience necessary--no obligations, just a learning experience.

Skaters Ready For.....

"The Big One" Tomorrow

By DAN KAMAL

Assistant Athletic Director Robert O'Connell was in Boston yesterday...to pick up the trophy that will go to the winner of tomorrow's Division II championship game between UMass and the University of Buffalo. One of the teams will earn the right to take that trophy to its campus. The winning team's captain may even skate around Orr Rink with it.

There are 10 seniors on the UMass hockey team. They were the first group of seniors recruited by Coach Jack Canniff, and they could very well be the first group of seniors to bring the ECAC Division II Championship to this campus. As Canniff said, "It's pretty fitting for them to have this opportunity."

So the opportunity is there, tomorrow night at Orr Rink at 8:00 p.m. and the opposition is there--in the form of a University of Buffalo club that went up to Vermont, a brutal place to play for a visiting club, and convincingly beat the Catamounts, 4-0.

The fact that Buffalo was able to beat Vermont at the latter's home rink was a mild shock--couple that with the fact that they were seeded a lowly fifth in the Division II playoffs, and it becomes a major upset.

Buffalo is the phantom of the playoffs as far as UMass is concerned. The Redmen have never played the Bulls as the upper-state New York contingent plays area teams in the bulk of its scheduling. There is only one report on the team that is the only thing standing between UMass and the Division crown.

That the Bulls were given such a low position in the play-off analysis has got to be an added incentive for them. The Division II seeding committee (yes, there is such a thing) obviously did a haphazard job in looking over Buffalo's credentials.

The Redmen are playing good hockey. It appears that they have finally broken out of a puzzling slump that saw them play such off and on hockey over the last month or so. In the quarter final game against St. Anselm's , the line centered by Don Riley accounted for three of UMass' five goals. In Wednesday's semi-final against Merrimack, Pat Keenan's line tallied three of the four goals with Mike Waldron of the Jim Coleman line adding the fourth.

So the offense has been well distributed; and the defense has for the most part played extremely well despite two short lapses one in each game that allowed the opposition to close within two goals in both cases. In explaining the lapses, Canniff said, "We let them beat us to the puck. It's a question of our lying back and thinking instead of reacting. We've got to keep out of those letdowns Saturday."

The UMass game is to be aggressive, and to begin lying back has proven near fatal in both playoff games, so Canniff's concern is well founded.

The Redmen have some bruises according to Canniff, but they are basically more healthy than they were a week ago when the playoffs started.

Buffalo is a big team; in fact, they are the only team in the playoffs that compares to the Redmen physically. They may even be slightly bigger overall. They are also faster than the Redmen--two good aspects in which to have an advantage.

But bigger, faster, or whatever doesn't mean too much on paper, especially in a game like this. This is it; this is the final "single elimination". This is the game where mistakes are magnified to the nth degree. This is the game in which the "goat" gets as much recognition as the "hero."

When asked his feelings on playing the Bulls instead of arch-rival Vermont, Canniff said, "The only difference is the home ice. If we can't win here, then it wasn't meant to be."

Whether it was "meant to be" for either team remains to be seen. The game shapes up as a very close, tense affair. This is the way all championships should be. It adds to the aura of the words "Championship Game."

Buffalo will be arriving sometime today. Not many people thought they would come this far. Only Merrimack coach Tom Lawler gave any inkling that the Bulls were a team to be reckoned with. Vermont Coach Jim Cross can be added to the list.

Jack Canniff will be able to judge more accurately some--around 10:00 p.m. tomorrow night.

UMass Baseball Clinic Tomorrow

The University of Massachusetts Athletic Department will conduct its fifth Baseball Clinic on Saturday, March 11.

UMass Coach Dick Bergquist has announced that registration for the Clinic will get underway at 8:45 a.m. in the Auxiliary Gymnasium of the Frank L. Boyden Physical Education Building. Assistant UMass Coach Al Barber will present "Fundamentals of Catching" at 9:30, using the varsity catching staff as his demonstrators. At 10:15, Bill Thurston, Head Coach at Amherst College, will discuss "Hitting" and will also present several drills for hitting practice.

The morning portion of the Clinic will conclude with a presentation by Coach Bergquist on "Pitching Fundamentals" with several pitchers from the nationally ranked UMass staff on exhibit.

Afternoon sessions will be held in Curry Hicks Cage where actual practice routine and drills will be demonstrated. At 2:30 there will be informal sessions on various aspects of the game with the discussion leaders being: Coaches Barber and Thurston, as well as Len Merullo, Cubs Scout; Tom McDonald, Red Sox Scout; and Bob Hansen, former UMass star now with the Milwaukee Brewers organization.

The Clinic will conclude at 3:30 p.m. and is intended for all players of high school age and coaches at all levels.

Futher information may be obtained from the Clinic Director, Coach Dick Bergquist at UMass.

"Big One" On WMUA

This Saturday evening, from Orr Rink, Dan Kamal and Bill Gallou will be calling all the action as the Redmen take on the Buffalo Bulls in the Division II championship game. This is the first championship game ever played at Orr Rink and the home of the Redmen, with its limited capacity of 1,200 is sure to be full for the climax of this season. Air time is 7:45 P.M. on WMUA, AT 91.1 FM, "The Voice of the Redmen".

And on Sunday night, at 10:00, Marty Kelley and Kent Best will host Sport Talk on WMUA. Guests will be Head Basketball Coach Jack Leaman and Capt. Mike Pagliara.

IM Notice

Anyone interested in officiating Intramural Softball or Soccer, please sign up in Room 215 Boyden.

Softball will be played from 5:15 to 11:15 and Soccer from 4:40 to 6:00.

Prophetic Quote Marks Mulcahy's Munchclub

By EARLE BARROLL

It's really a shame that Jim Bouton beat me to it.

But maybe one of these days I'll finally get to publish my answer to Bouton's zanny world of baseball. I'm calling it "Mulcahy's Munchclub", the weekly happenings, printable and otherwise, that eminate from the Halls of the Newman Center during the one hour each Wednesday they call "Varsity M Club Luncheons."

It's zanny, it's serious, it's a lot of different meanings to many, but you couldn't spend a better lunch hour on campus in lieu of what takes place behind those seemingly steady walls facing Mahar Auditorium.

This past Wednesday featured the UMass hockey team, only eight hours away from the opening face-off of their semi-final clash with Merrimack.

After this luncheon, the game that night was anti-climatic.

Could you imagine the nerve of a prophetic defenseman by the name of Al Nickerson saying, "I hope Buffalo beats Vermont so we play for the championship at home."

Could you imagine a forward by the name of Eric Scrafield saying, "UMass has a chance of becoming a national power in hockey." Or could you imagine freshman coach Russ Kidd disclosing that, "Of the top 20 high school players in eastern Mass., of the ten or twelve that have applied at UMass, eight will be rejected."

And then go on to say, "The Ivy Leagues are accepting boys we couldn't get in here at UMass."

Well, it all happened this Wednesday as the hockey team enjoyed their final noontime before taking to the ice at Orr Rink.

Head coach Jack Canniff was in Boston recruiting and was unable to make the luncheon, but the chores of presenting the program travelled effortlessly from Tom Peters, a former UMass player and now graduate student at UMass and public relations man for the puckster, to defenseman Bob Bartholemew who handled intros and his monologue with ease.

Scrafield pointed out that the only thing separating UMass hockey from the top teams in the nation is an ice facility. "We could have been national contenders even now if we had had ice time and a home facility during the past couple of seasons," he emphasized.

Both Peters and Scrafield lauded Canniff for the outstanding job he's done over the past five years which led Peters to say of the program, "It's hit a zenith this year."

Kidd, who coached the freshman to a 6-6-1 record, cited the Harvard Athletic Bubble as a possible model for a new ice complex. The only stipulation is "No one sticks a pin into it."

In looking to next season, Kidd invisioned pre-season as a "blood bath", but went on to say, "This creates a healthy situation for the team.

"My team this year has five or six forwards and two or three defensemen who will help the varsity next year."

But when it got to the subject of goalies, Kidd had a great one here when he said, "Goalies are the boobs of the classroom."

P.J. Flaherty, who happened to be sitting at the head table, just shook his head and nibbled away at the crust of his blueberry pie.

The Radio Plays The Music

Chris sits in front of a slanted brushed aluminunm console. Right arm poised above his head, left arm extended across the desk to a large knob to the left side, he looks through the glass to Andy who sits in the next room, ready to start a record playing at Chris' signal.

"This is WMUA in Amherst," murmurs Chris into a cigar-shaped microphone. His right hand falls; left hand turns the knob counterclockwise; Andy's hand moves over the motionless record; then the lp turns; Chris' meters jump, he throws the switch with his left hand and the speakers explode into Jerry Garcia's "The Wheel".

I stood against a panel as two men in blue work shirts and carrying olive-green tool boxes strode to a ceiling high two-foot-wide panel filled with knobs and meters of all sizes, jacks, cables, and an FM radio. Chris rose from his station, removed his headphones and squeezed past me. Smiling, he hefted twenty or thirty lp's under his arm and maneuvered his way past the two intruders through a door to the console and turntables where "The Wheel" turned.

Wondering at the apparent intrustion, I asked the nearest station member what had happened. I was told that "Bell was putting in lines for the new transmitter." Thus the final steps for the long anticipated WMUA power increase are being completed.

About a year ago WMUA, the student-run 10 watt non-commercial FM station at UMass received a "construction permit" to make all necessary engineering changes for broadcast at 1,000 watts in stereo on 91.1 megacycles. There were problems, like finding a location for the station's new antenna tower, which had to be as high as possible, yet still near the UMass campus. After much discussion and a promise to residents of Dickinson House on Orchard Hill that television interference was virtually impossible, the staff of WMUA located a new transmitter (the opposite of a radio takes sound and converts it into radio waves) and broadcast antenna on top of Dickinson House in the eighth floor ironing closet. To carry the stereo sound from WMUA's studios in the engineering

The Overthrow Part VII

This was it, the night of the big operation. Bigger even than The Great Fog, when Nick, Big Louie, and I got to thinking about what we were up to this evening the adrenalin flowed fast and furious. What we were about to embark upon was an adventure that could mean an ultimate coup d'etat of the English 125 program.

Two o'clock in the morning and we had picked up the marijuana (fifty ounces, remember) from Franklin the Great (amidst great pomp and ceremony from that great personage). Making sure that we attracted little attention (as little as three masked-men could attract) we made our way to the Physical Plant Building. Nick carried the "tools" for the operation in a briefcase.

Now, I'm not sure whether you go around checking out the buildings on this campus (unless, of course, you're perverted and like to make phalluses out of pillars, and rectums out of connecting passageways) but if you ever looked at the book depositary you will have noticed that there are no windows in that building (something like a vagina, maybe, Rich?) We would have to make our way through the insides of the Physical Plant into the depository.

Out of the scope of the spotlight on the top of the building, we pushed Big Louie's froggy little body through a small window. Then we waited. The Midget (Big Louis, if you want to be formal) came around to the door and we sneaked in fast.

"Hey, look at this shit", Big Louie pointed to the wall laughing. I couldn't believe my eyes, it was like something out of my Boy Scout Camp days from the bygone past. There before us, shining like a golden-toothed monster was a huge mahogany board with little brilliant plates that notated the innumerable "Outstanding Physical Plant Employees" If you don't think that this greatest monument to banality actually exists take a little walk sometime down to the Physical Plant.

We made our way upstairs to the books and easily found the English 125 section. We were going to start work on Ten Plays by Euripides as most sections would be reading that in a couple of weeks.

We worked by flashlight, first spraying the pages of each book (as we flapped the pages over very quickly) with a quick-drying glue. Working about an hour on this phase we finished (a tribute to our teamwork) and took a break. We had worked in silence up until this point.

"All these words around us", said Big Louis in a rare moment of philosophical meditation (referring to the books all around us), "and no noise."

Terrific. This was no time to get mushy, I thought. "Back to work," I ordered.

While Nick and I worked hard at cutting out the now laminated pages of the books (cutting with Exacto knife and ruler) Big Louie worked even harder bagging the two hundred quarter-ounce bags of dope.

Everything was going like clockwork when all of a sudden a light shown off in the direction of the stairway. With piles of pages from Euripides strewn about and hundreds of little bags of dope lying around (amounting to the number of years we would probably have to spend in a penal institution if we were caught) we felt trapped. I don't know what you'd do–I'm sorry to say that Big Louis panicked.

He ran right out the front entrance of the depository with the security guard hot on his heels. The minute they were out I rasped, "Let's finish up."

Very quickly the baggie job was finished and even more quickly they were stuffed into the hollowed books. We cleaned up our mess (never let it be said that this group of revolutionaries were litterbugs) and sneaked out the back.

Back in Southwest we went to Nick's room in MacKimmie and who should we find relaxing like it was 5:00 in the evening (it was 5:00 in the morning) but the Midget himself, intact from his close call.

"Where've you all been?" he asked. "Been waiting for you for the longest time." We told him to shut up, and we sat down feeling the post-revolutionary blues coming on.

"By the way," Big Louie said, "I managed to appropriate a little of the action." And as he pulled out a huge bag of dope he went on: "I thought you said there wasn't any."

We patted him on the back and shook his hand sitting down in anticipation of our very imminent voyage to (as Rico and Carl would say) the "State of Oblivion."

Muskie: Down And Out?

Will last Tuesday's New Hampshire primary results adversely effect Edmund Muskie's Lincolnesque image? Have the Granite State's "independent" voters found a leak in Honest Ed's seemingly solid character? On pages six and seven, Barry Rubenstein offers an in-depth analysis on the Maine Senator's campaign and points out what possible long-term damage might have been inflicted by Muskie's reaction to the attacks by the Manchester Union Leader. At the same time the author questions what possible political mileage might be gained by the other Democratic contenders. Are they fishing in a lifeless lake? Or has Muskie's momentum been abruptly halted?

Only The Lonely Marched...

Everyone has their day. Italians have Columbus Day, Lovers have Valentine's Day, Patriots have V--J Day, Groundhogs have Groundhog Day, and now the Women have one of their very own. The hallowed occasion took place, if you happened to have missed the parade and subsequent show in the Student Union Ballroom, this past Wednesday, and hot off the presses is Frank Baglione's subjective report of the event. Poor Richard's resident social columnist questions whether the early peaking of the Women's Movement might not now be spelling its end. And might the fall of Lib's momentum be somehow tied to the decline of the idealistic "movement" as a whole. Turn to pages eight and nine for what promises to be a sharp look at a seemingly unfiery struggle.

Busby Berkeley Lives Again

Some years back a young lady named Twiggy turned the fashion world on end and many people couldn't quite understand why. Then a fellow Britisher Ken Russell made a name for himself with his sensual film interpretation of D.H. Lawrence's Women In Love. They both began to sink in self-deserved oblivion from such fine beginnings that is until director and star joined forces for a film version of Sandie Wilson's pastiche The Boy Friend and the resulting combination hasn't been equaled since the beguiling days of Fred Astaire and Ginger Rodgers. With Twiggy as star the film is a constant delight as it ingeniously camps the great film musicals of the Thirties. Busby Berkely is alive and well and living in the mind of Ken Russell, and the treat's now yours at your neighborhood theater. For more on The Boy Friend see page thirteen.

And More Tempting Tasties

Ever hear what James Joyce instructed his wife to do to their correspondences? Well hopefully no one on the opposite page would want it done to theirs, instead we print them and if you have something to say, follow instructions at our right. Then move on to page five where Philip Christopher attempts a distinct perspective on this current period in our history through the use of Henry Kissinger as the major protagonist. After more politics, both national and sexual, jump to our reviews. Records first. John McGlaughlin and Spirit, an eight and a five respectively on scale of ten; on pages ten and eleven. Then Celebration the Lion Share Company's production is somewhat damned on page twelve. Then Frank Johnson continues his epic saga behind the scenes in high fidelity, back on page fourteen. A New Puzzle this week on film titles on page fifteen and Weekend, what to do in these parts, so to speak, is on page sixteen.

CorrespondenceTo Poor Richard's

Dear Sir:

There are presently 24 million unregistered potential voters, between the ages of 18-24 years of age, in this country. It would seem that we all share a common responsibility to provide the information and impetus to make people aware of the opportunity to become involved in the selection of future political leaders.

A&M Records is very much committed to the voter registration campaign. We are in the process of pressing a special double LP, featuring songs from our recent album releases, which has been specifically designed as an incentive item for voter registration. Such artists as CAT STEVENS, CARPENTERS, JOE COCKER, PAUL WILLIAMS, LEE MICHAELS, BILLY PRESTON, MIMI FARINA & TOM JANS, etc. will be featured on the album.

The album will be given free to anyone who has a voter registration receipt which was obtained during our campaign. Thousands of copies of this album have also been given to the STUDENT VOTE, a national voter registration organization, to be distributed to local registration booths around the country.

A&M Records is also releasing a special single about voter registration as a public service to radio stations around the country. The song, entitled "The Power 18", by an artist named MUSTANG, is a very sincere and powerful plea for everyone to realize the importance of this campaign.

We would like to urge that every radio station, newspaper and community organization become involved in the present voter registration drive. Many radio stations are running present voter registration drive. Many radio stations are running voter registration marathons and are opening registration booths at their stations.

Public service announcements, including voter registration information, could be run continually throughout the day. Newspapers could be providing similar information through a special column providing voter registration data.

The voter registration campaign is something which is of vital importance to all of us. Its ramifications are more of a social rather than a purely political nature; the opportunity to vote in this country is a basic premise upon which our democratic system is founded.

Let's all work together on this project. Thanks for listening.

My best,
ANDREW MEYER
DIRECTOR OF COLLEGE PROMOTION
A&M RECORDS

To the Editor,

In reference to Mr. Baglione's "Teaching An Old Running Dog New Tricks," allow me to stand speechless for a few minutes. Glib Mr. Baglione seems to have even achieved the impossible of out-glibbing himself.

Our capable author of antics seemed to be talking as much about his own persecuted past as he was about that of Mr. Nixon's.

"At home we found the idealistic young were not above bloodying their hands either," he so aptly stated. Yes, since Pilate, many figures have had bloodied hands and even Mr. Baglione is often seen in some corner of the campus washing stained fingers under the soothing flow of water.

What stains? Well, now, where shall be begin?? How about the dedicated Mr. Baglione shouting down the Hump, and later offering to soothe the image of our dear President Nixon.

Or what about Mr. Baglione's fervent support of the Women's movement, now demoted to writing what promises to be no glowing centerspread.

Or what about his connection with the "pimps of the printed page," those nasty termpaper dealers who promise to canonize with good marks all those who dare to enter their office.

Yes, Mr. Baglione's rhetoric certainly reveals much.

Janet Longret

Dear Editor:

Without trying to bestow a fool's portion of flattery upon Poor Richard's I must admit I am an avid reader of it. Since its advent as a rather obscure four page supplement to the Collegian I have watched it blossom into a successful and interesting sixteen page "compendium for the spirit."

The Staff of Poor Richard's is made up of approximately twenty people, and this staff works hard to consistently present a publication to the UMass campus that provides commentary, interpretation, and information concerning contemporary music, movies, and literature, as well as a guide to activities in the five college area. It is the kind of publication that this campus has been in dire need of for quite some time.

Recently I went up to the Collegian office to investigate into the operation of Poor Richard's Magazine. I was very surprised to find out that the entire operation of it is confined to two desks cramped into a corner of the office. The two desks were obviously inadequate to support the burden of publishing a sixteen page paper. They must serve the purpose of writing and typing articles, collection of all the ads and copy, laying out the pages and a host of other details that go into the process of delivering a newspaper to the public.

Poor Richard's has asked for additional space allocation from the SUG Board and its request has met considerable opposition. If the SUG Board deems it necessary for semi-annual publications such as Yahoo and Spectrum to occupy rather large individual offices, why does it ignore the request of a weekly publication that serves the campus in more fruitful way? (This is not to mention the "patronizing" space allocation to groups such as the Outing Club and the Science Fiction Club.) I suggest that the SUG Board use more integrity as well as objectivity in allocating space to campus groups. If this campus wishes the continuation of a useful publication such as Poor Richard's then something must be done to vastly improve the conditions under which it operates.

Thank you,
Betsy Frawley

building more than a half a mile to Dickinson for broadcast requires two good quality telephone lines thus "Bell" telephone last week began installation of the lines at the main studio during Chris' show.

Although the new broadcasting equipment is fundamentally operable, there are some technicalities that must be worked out by the engineering staff of the station before the transmitter can be operated properly from the Marston Hall studios. As Chief Engineer Jay Ballard explains, "When everything is working right, a field engineer from the FCC office in Boston will come out and inspect everything, then we will be issued a temporary license to operate at 1,000 watts. Ninety-nine and ninety-nine one hundredths percent of the time, once you receive that temporary permit, the FCC in Washington will give you a permament one within a few months." When asked how soon WMUA would be operating at 1,000 watts with the temporary permit, Jay replied, looking down, "It's impossible to say, I don't know." Through further discussion it was indicated that the power boost may come within three or four weeks. But "stereo may be awhile" says Ballard.

In the past, WMUA could only be received in mono for a few miles around the UMass campus. Now although 10 watts to 1,000 watts does not mean a correspondingly large boost in distance reception of the station, WMUA will be easily receivable in stereo for fifteen to twenty miles in each direction, and will serve the communities of Springfield, Holyoke, Greenfield and Northampton, as well as Amherst and Belchertown. This means that the station will have a potential listening audience of about 300,000 people, of which less than one-fifth are college students. In the past, WMUA's audience has been primarily UMass and Amherst College students-now it will include a ten or fifteen mile stretch of the heavily populated Connecticut River valley.

Since WMUA's potential audience at 1,000 watts will be mainly non-college students, one would expect that its programming should be altered to suit the tastes and needs of its new non-college audience. But according to Jim Concannon, Acting Program Director of WMUA, the only change at 1,000 watts will be "a more stressed degree of professionalism" on the part of the station staff. Concannon said last Monday that WMUA's responsibility will remain "Primarily to the students as a whole."

In his job, Concannon will be "programming for what people want to hear...to reach the facets of the University community." When asked how he could tell what people wanted to hear, he replied, "That's a problem. You should have a basic idea of how you want your programming to go. There's definite underlying structure," (in the programming of WMUA) He termed that structure as "free form informative", but said that "we do have a general, common-sense rule that one half your show should come from the playlist", because the music on the playlist "is new and people want to hear it." A playlist is a listing of twenty or thirty new album releases compiled weekly. Some new releases are excluded from the list, if, in the opinion of the Music Director they are not good enough for air play. "We don't want to be oldies radio," said Concannon.

When asked his definition of public affairs programming, Concannon answered, "the kind of programming you have to do to make your audience aware of what's happening in the community." Then he cited the "Week in Review", "CBS Massy Lectures", "Cycle Breaker" and "Focus" as examples of "public affairs" programming. Also included were "Ujamma Drum", jazz and classical music, and news as examples of "cultural public affairs programs."

Martin J. Waters was Program Director of WMUA until last week at which time he resigned to take a position at another radio station. His programming philosophy is similar to Jim Concannon's: "You should appeal to some segment of students all the time. Nothing is done primarily for mass appeal." When asked how he stayed responsive to what people wanted to hear day-to-day he responded, "Phone calls. People will call and say 'Why isn't the hockey game on?'; or 'Why is the hockey on, play some music!'" He said that "anything recorded goes" so long as there were no swears contained in the material. He said that as Program Director he was always open to reasonable suggestions from outside people. In considering a program for broadcast he would consider "how it's goin' to fit in with other things we're trying."

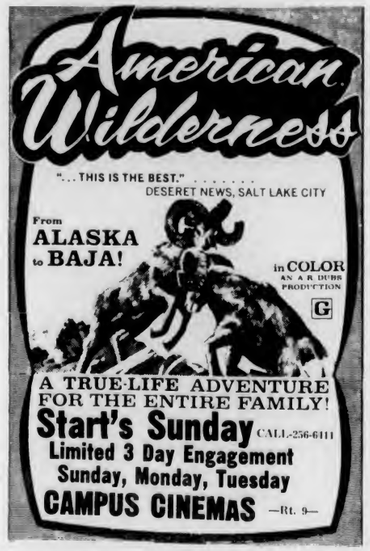
Richard Muller, Asst. Prof. of Communications Science at Hampshire College offers a third purpose of college and non-commercial broadcasting in general. It should "give the community a forum for discussion of current issues," and "I think it's perfectly appropriate for WMUA to conceive of the people it serves as the University community."

Prof. Muller stressed a second purpose of college radio as being to teach staff members techniques of remote recording and broadcast journalism. "One of the things wrong with playing disc jockey and thinking up a cute line of patter is that you don't necessarily learn very much," said Muller.

There is evidence that WMUA has a large listening audience–at least of UMass students. In an "audience survey" conducted by telephone by Martin J. Waters for his Speech 228 course last semester, WMUA had a significantly larger listening audience among UMass students that any other station, including WCCC, WDRC, and WHCN, all of Hartford. But the survey did not attempt to poll any other segment of the Amherst community and only involved responses. To quote the first paragraph of Mr. Water's report:

> "This project was developed with the intent of determining the effectiveness of WMUA's programming within the station's primary audience group-the undergraduate students of UMass/Amherst. These are the people who paid $55,000 dollars last year alone to keep WMUA on the air. This is the group which the station was intended to serve when its license and charter were granted in 1949. Yet no survey of the sort undertaken here has been done for at least seven years."

The measurement of quality and level of performance of a broadcast station depends ultimately on a simple test--how it sounds on the air, who listens to it, and why? Air quality depends on three factors--money, facilities, and personnel. WMUA is one of the best equipped college stations in New England as could be shown by a comparison study. WMUA is endowed with a budget of about $45,000 yearly (not including purchase cost of a new transmitter) from the Student Senate. It could also be shown from a comparison study that such a budget is more than necessary for the operation of a college station similar to WMUA. Therefore, it is up to the personnel of WMUA, the student officers which are paid $6,000 annually from the budget of the station, to push the station towards the goals suggested by Ms. Concannon, Waters and Muller.



WMUA appears to be wasting money and space allocated to it by the students of the University. During some long-range planning a year ago, WMUA was allotted a considerable amount of space including several offices on the third floor of the Student Union. Apparently WMUA has made little or no use of that space since they were allotted it. While interviewing Sheldon Katzman, Business Manager of the station, the subject of the Student Union space was mentioned, and one member of the station present quipped to Katzman, "You've got an office you never use!"Indeed, John Zizis, Station Manager explained away some $2,230.00 in McCurdy studio equipment to be purchased from the 1972 budget as intended for the SU offices. "We've got to start doing something with that space, or we'll lose it," said Zizis.

Arnie --------, Chairman of the SUG Board Space sub-committee suggests that University students should call for a re-evaluation of the space available in the Student Union if WMUA does not use the space alloted soon. Station Manager John Zizis says the space will be used for offices and studios of WMUA, but a move from Marston Hall to the Student Union will require funds that the station does not have available. WMUA has been unsuccessful thus far in obtaining a grant for such a move.

A similar inflation of the station budget seems obvious. Examples include $500.00 for the purchase of subscriptions to Rolling Stone, Billboard, Newsweek, The Globe, The New York Times, and The Springfield Union as well as other books and publications; $1,560. for a salaried "technical assistant" (the station already retains a student Chief Engineer at $25. wk.); $400. for "photo services"; $660. for a top-of-the-line RCA monitoring system which could consist of a simple stereo receiver with speakers: $100. for a voltmeter that the University Engineering Department could provide; and $1150. for the two new turntables. (The station already has five.)

WMUA is doing a creditable job with the abundant resources available–it is up to the station staff to do an excellent job. What the station most needs to develop is a core of responsible, competent, and hard-working students interested in the production of community oriented-stimulating journalistic studies for broadcast to the University community. And that, with the exception of a few hours a week, seems to be lacking.

His Hands Are In Everything

BY PHILIP CHRISTOPHER

"He and his ever-growing National Security Council staff are making policy. . .he's taken over the functions of the State Department. He's flown off on 12 or 14 secret trips. He's got a string of 25 or 30 starlets he takes out. He seems to pack 36 hours into every day where the rest of us have only 24."

Although accusing Henry Kissinger of pre-empting the State Department's traditional role in foreign policy making, Representative Wayne Hays' (Dem. Ohio) quote nevertheless comes off sounding like the advance man preparing for the impending arrival of his superstar candidate.

Of the spices necessary in brewing a fair history, clearly "time" is essential in adding a proper perspective. Yet, now and then, an exceptionally strong trend or character emerges to influence the contemporary scene to such a degree as to insure earning more than just a footnote. Henry Kissinger is such a character.

During the past few weeks, Kissinger has been lauded as the principal architect of the now fabled China visit of President Nixon. Yet this frosting praise has only served to cover the true substance of the cake. Behind the obvious success of the jaunt to the East lies an even more stunning diplomatic coup in which Dr. Kissinger emerges as an indisputable historical figure-to-be.

Much like the diplomatic figure he so admires, Metternich, Kissinger, by accepting the post in the Nixon administration, had been charged of opportunism and reactionism by the progressive community in the United States. A community an intelligencia, of which he was once an intregal part. But unlike his counterpart on the domestic scene, Pat Moynihan, Kissinger did not fall in the face of Liberal criticism.

On the contrary, by ignoring his critics, he managed to accrue an amazing influence over the nation's chief policy-maker. Richard Nixon. So much so that Congressmen like Wayne Hays and William Fulbright now fear that the State Department is on a serious path of decline from which it may never recover. Compounding this animosity is the fact that Dr. Kissinger has repeatedly refused to appear before Congress to testify on matters of foreign policy.

For one man to effectively downgrade the importance of an American institution such as the State Department is no small deed. And to have done it in three short years, with a brilliant record of his own achievements to fill the void left by the faceless State, adds all the more magic to the myth which is presently being created in the basement of the White House.

Paralleling Kissinger with Clemens Prince Metternich perhaps may shed some light on the future path of American diplomacy, or at least aid us in explaining the moves of the past couple of years.

Metternich, for over 30 years the foreign minister of the Austrian Empire, rose to power at a time when all Europe trembled before the advancing armies of Napoleon. Yet, with his ability in weighing advantages and devising compromises, Metternich managed to placate Napoleon on one front while at the same time negotiating; with other European powers whose purpose was to halt the defeat the armies of the French Emperor.

After the abdication of Napoleon, Europe's major powers entered into a struggle of repartitioning Europe. In the forefront of this battle was found Metternich.

Sir Llewellyn Woodward has written that the Austrian's greatest talent was a "sensitiveness to the existence of general European interests." He firmly believed that conflicting national interests on the continent would have to be reconciled in order to achieve general peace and stability. His genius lay in being able to produce the formulas that made such reconciliations possible. At the same time, he was fully aware of rising and threatening powers, and was especially weary of Alexander's Russia.

Henry Kissinger and Richard Nixon.

Many historians now hold that Metternich was a reactionary, fearful of liberalism. And it is true that he put down potential revolutions in Italy and the fragmented German states. Others point out however, that Metternich's policies against the liberal movements throughout Europe were based more on a fear of disrupting the tenuous balance of power which then existed on the continent. His primary concern, then, was not to prevent revolutions for the sake of preserving the social status quo, but to prevent them because they were instruments that could, and later did, throw Europe into a dangerous and unstable political maelstrom.

Today, the stage is not restricted to Europe. It is much larger for it includes the whole world. The characters, also, are different. Yet the script is similar, with balance of power diplomacy lacing the plot.

Onto this stage three years ago stepped Henry Kissinger. As Metternich did, he quickly solidified his positions of power and influence within his own government. And with equal swiftness began to mold and develop what is today being hailed as Nixonian diplomacy, of which the crowning achievement to this point has been the China trip.

Contrary to the charges of many Democratic presidential candidates, the China trip was not a political move on the part of Richard Nixon. As in the case of each and every diplomatic exchange, a series of very real circumstances led to the re-opening of relations between the United States and China. In short, both countries, for very different reasons, felt that the balance of power was being threatened. The threat, oddly enough, came from that same nation that had so worried Metternich in the early 19th century...the Soviet Union.

In the past decade, China's two major armed clashes have occured with neighboring states, the Soviet Union and India. In its 1969 clash with the Russians, a very real threat to its security emerged. Regardless of population figures, the USSR is infinitely more powerful than China. Had any major conflict broken out, China would not only have been exposed to an aggressor on the north, but to an enemy in the south, an unfriendly Japan to the East, and, for good measure, half a million American troops also to the south. One can imagine the scenarios in Peking that winter.

Within six months of the Sino-Soviet border incident, the American ambassador to Poland, Walter Stoessel, was formally meeting with Lei Yang, the Chinese charge d'affaires, in an attempt to move toward the normalization of relations, as President Nixon then stated to Charles de Gaulle, the initial middle-man. Yet this is not to be simply interpreted as a move by a threatened and frightened China. The United States also had its reasons for welcoming the re-opening of talks.

Just after being nominated by his party in 1968, Richard Nixon witnessed the invasion of Czechoslovakia which seriously unsettled Europe for the first time in a decade. The Soviet Union had effectively re-established its tight control over Eastern Europe. At the same time, other "threatening" moves by the Russians included the supplying of Arab countries with military and economic aid, the building of a Mediterranean fleet and more recently, the signing of a non-aggression and mutual aid pact with India and the building of still another fleet in the Indian ocean.

By the time Richard Nixon stepped from the "Spirit of '76" onto Peking soil and returned the handshake that Dulles had refused Chou En-lai in 1956, the lines were clearly drawn. In fact, most, if not all, of the work had been done.

In July, 1971, Henry Kissinger, feigning illness while in Pakistan, swept secretly into China for long talks with Premier Chou En-lai. In October of last year, Kissinger made still another trip to Peking. In the words of Time correspondent Hugh Sidey, who covered Nixon's China trip:

"There is a feeling that Henry Kissinger and Chou En-lai put it all down on paper months ago, then stamped their chops on the agreement, shook hands and just waited for the actors to come onstage and do their parts."

And so as Dr. Kissinger dropped into the background, Richard Nixon stepped to center stage and completed the script which had been three years in the making somewhere in the basement of the hite House. Yet Kissinger did not disappear completely. He was present at virtually all the meetings with Chou En-lai, accompanied Nixon to the home of Mao and was the major American draftsman of the joint U.S.–Chinese communique, leaving observers with no further questions as to who was the number one man in American foreign affairs.

It was Kissinger, also, who was chosen by Nixon to meet the press and explain the points outlined in the joint communique. And several points within that paper might even be clues as to what Dr. Kissinger is going to do for an encore.

It is stated: "The two sides agree that they will stay in contact through various channels, including the sending of a senior U.S. representative to Peking from time to time for concrete consultations to further the normalization of relations between the two countries and continue to exchange views on issues of common interest."

It has not been revealed who that representative may be but it has been announced in the past week that Dr. Kissinger will fly to Tokyo in April for high level talks.

Kissinger's China policy now begins to bloom. Not only have relations been informally opened between the two superpowers, but President Nixon's visit and Premier Chou's warm welcome can be interpreted only as a warning by Soviet observers.

Muskie Down But Not Out

BY BARRY RUBENSTEIN

While most Presidential candidates launch their campaigns in widely-covered press conferences in big cities or in caucuses with party leaders, the candidacy of Edmund Sixtus Muskie was born in, of all unlikely spots, Washington, Pennsylvania. And while George McGovern broke all the rules by announcing his candidacy a year before the election, Muskie's future appeared certain almost four years ago. There were no experts there, no Larry O'Brien's or Al Lowenstein's to plan the strategy. Instead, a college kid named Rick Brody who was trying to redide Muskie for his stance on the war ironically transformed the Maine Senator into the leading Presidential candidate four years later.

The future of defeated Vice-Presidential candidates is usually a political wasteland. Neither Bill Miller, nor Henry Cabot Lodge, nor even Estes Kefauver ever rose from the ashes of their abortive quests for glory to the prominence of our hero. But for a twist of his rhetorical wrist, the Maine Democrat might be no more threat for a November victory than some of his opponents in the New Hampshire primary. As the only candidate of the 1968 campaign who even had the ability to handle a heckler, however, Muskie ran away with the rookie of the year honors with future greatness only a year or two or four away.

Such a break as the Brody incident has been no stranger to Muskie throughout his career. In 1954, he was elected Governor of his state against a Republican who argued that Maine didn't have any poor people. He elevated himself to the Senate in 1958 with the aide of the Sherman Adams-Bernard Goldfine scandals. And, if the opposition in 1968 hadn't made him look good by comparison, the events of Chappaquidick all but wiped out the hopes of his most powerful competitor.

All of this is not to say that our champion has had it easy. To do so would be heresy and would also belie the Lincolnesque background his supporters so proudly claim for him. Since the days when the Rail Splitter from Illinois made tall and homely synonymous with honesty, every aspiring politician has made some effort to play Horatio Alger. Few, however, have been as successful as Muskie who often speaks of his father, Stephen Marciszewski, who "tore himself out of his home life, away from a family he would never see again, to go to a foreign land with only five years' formal education, with a newly learned trade as a tailor, to find opportunity for himself and for children who were yet unborn. And the year before he died, his son became the first Polish-American ever elected Governor of an American state." To complete the image, Muskie shyly admits that his mother, though 81 years old, still sometimes takes in the neighbor's laundry.

The tall, homely candidate who, as one observer noticed, "speaks at a rate almost twice as slow as that of any other candidate for President", has a few other things going for him besides his background. In a year in which the names of at least ten men have been mentioned as candidates for the Democratic Presidential nomination, it remains obvious that only one of them can finish the race in front. While most of his opponents battle for students, or blacks, or the unemployed, Muskie has been content to out-middle the opposition, a skill he no doubt acquired in the 1968 campaign.

He has displayed a great deal of political strength throughout his career, particularly within the last year when he made the statement that he would not have a black running mate because he did not feel the country would elect him with one. Though he was criticized in many circles for the comment, most people realized that what he had said was true and that he had been very courageous to come out and say it.

For the liberal voter, the situation looks this way. Muskie is not as satisfactory on the war issue as McGovern (he supported it for many years), but he's better than Jackson. Though he can't match Humphrey's record on civil rights, he is again better than Mills or Wallace. On his credit side must be listed the facts that Humphrey has already blown his chance and that everyone seems to think that McGovern is a one issue candidate. As for Lindsay, how can the Democrats trust him?

Speaking of trust, that seems to be the issue that has surpassed all others among the Democrats. In fact, Muskie has spent the early part of his campaign "establishing credibility" which led a group of reporters to compose a song which includes the line, "Being ugly sure beats thinkin'." Although he promises that this phase of his campaign is almost over, Muskie seems content to let his competitors fight over the issues.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

While New Hampshire may have removed some of the quiet cockiness of the Muskie thrust, it by no means will cause panic in his camp. Though primary elections can be important for underdog candidates to build strength, the frontrunner who has done his political homework cannot be completely crushed by a poor showing in a single contest. Although he didn't formally announce his candidacy until a few months ago, his organization has been at work for many months speaking to the political leaders across the country. Though the McGovern Commission report has made some significant changes in the delegate selection systems, the true power still lies with a few people in each state and Muskie has touched all bases in this area.

What the results of Tuesday's primary, do mean however is that Muskie is going to have to really go to work in the states where he has not been able to get committments. As Muskie's political co-ordinator Jack English put it, "There was only one tactic: go across the board in every state and tell them, 'Either you're with us or against. Just tell us now. Because if you're against us, we have to run a primary against you'."

As it now stands, Muskie is in 47 states and is the only candidate with a mathematical chance of pulling the 1,509 delegates needed for nomination on the first ballot. But the frontfunner knows that he hasn't got that many votes locked up and that a series of early setbacks could cause a snowball effect for McGovern or Humphrey. So there will be some hard work to do in the future.

The results of Tuesday's New Hampshire primary must be disheartening for Muskie. With the first contest coming in his own back yard, many observers felt it would be a golden opportunity for him to dump a few of his competitors right away. As it turned out, however, the Granite state has dealt the Maine Senator what could possibly turn into a phyrric victory.

For the last month or so, predictions of Muskie's results ranged as high as 55% with general agreement focusing on the 50% figure as a reasonable result. On the other side, the McGovern forces were openly admitting they would consider anything around 25% a good showing.

The final tallies, however, showed Muskie with less than half of the vote (48%) and while he may claim that as a victory, only a view of his post-election announcement was necessary to see that he was definitely worried and disappointed. In the McGovern camp, the attitude was one of surprise and elation with the South Dakota candidate garnering about 10% more votes (37%) than many were expecting and at least 5% more than the candidate really felt he needed to put some pressure on Muskie.

Muskie, meanwhile, continues to claim victory, politically as well as numerically, in New Hampshire:

"You know my skepticism about polls and especially in primaries, and I don't really think that northern New England people are that volatile that they can shift that violently . . . when I get 50% of the vote with, well, how many other rivals did I have, four or five, in a Democratic primary, and a powerful newspaper publisher, all campaigning against me, I'd say that's a pretty good endorsement."

But in every newspaper that hit the streets on Wednesday morning, the headlines read, "Muskie is the winner, but . . ."

While Muskie scoffed at McGovern's claim that New Hampshire was a moral victory for him, he surely realizes what these early primaries are all about. McGovern knows that he cannot beat Muskie head to head right now. What the important thing about these early tests is not how many delegates can be acquired, although that must be taken into consideration, but whether or not Muskie can emerge from the primaries with the image of a winner.

Muskie knows that he must make strong showings in the March and early April battles so that he gains money and support in non-primary states and eventually reach the magic number of 1,509 delegates needed for nomination. Certainly Muskie's image of being a strong candidate must be tarnished by the New Hampshire shows. Next Tuesday, he must face the likes of Wallace, Humphrey, Lindsay and Jackson in a primary he knows he cannot win.

More than anything else then, the New Hampshire primary has made Florida more important, not so much for McGovern as for Muskie. At this time, McGovern is not primarily trying to show that he alone can beat Muskie but that Muskie can be beaten. Although he realizes that he cannot make a strong showing in Florida, he also knows that Muskie must.

Wallace will win in the Sunshine State. But as usual in these primaries, the winner is not always all that the title implies. The key battle to watch will be between Muskie and Humphrey, who has made a strong effort in this state. If the former Presidential candidate can come out ahead of Muskie, the road may be all downhill for him. To add to his problems, John Lindsay has also made a major effort here as has Senator Henry Jackson. While Muskie was spending the last week trying to prevent disaster from happening in New Hampshire, Humphrey, Lindsay and Jackson have been shaking hands and baby-kissing on the streets of Miami. It may turn out that Muskie has lost on both fronts.

Acting in Muskie's favor in Florida is the fact that the campaign has been so inundated with candidates that many people feel that the results will be politically useless. And though the issue of bussing may force the Democratic frontrunner to drop the campaign of trust, it will also cloud the significance of the results.

While it would be inaccurate to characterize Muskie's recent fortunes as a demise, he certainly cannot be as confident as he one was.

Whether the Politics of Trust can carry Muskie to the White House is a question a lot of people are beginning to ask, especially in the last few weeks. One issue which has hurt Muskie has been his failure to divulge the sources of his financial support, as McGovern and McCloskey have done. Many observers feel that a revelation of his financial backing would cause many voters to have second thoughts about the names of several big businessmen who are thought to be important contributors to the Muskie effort. Also, Muskie men claim that several Republicans, including Nixon fund-raisers, appear on the lists. There is no doubt that the issue of campaign expenditures hurt him, but it is difficult to say how much. His counter claims that he revealed his expenditures in 1970 while McGovern failed to seemed to be glossed over with people wondering, if then, why not now?

The sad part of the New Hampshire result is that William Loeb, editor and publisher of the Manchester Union Leader, probably did as much damage to the Muskie campaign as anyone. It was he who raised the questions of Muskie's attitudes towards French Canadians (a large percentage of New Hampshire Democrats), and of his wife's statements in an interview with Women's Wear Daily.

Although the readership of the Union Leader is the largest in the state, Muskie would probably have been better off in not responding to these charges at all, or at least in a more restrained manner than the tear-studded performance which he gave. Though being human should eliminate no man from consideration for the White House, the New Hampshire voters seemed to judge Muskie's actions less than favorably.

But all of this can only be speculation. What caused the New Hampshire voters to cast their ballots as they did is not the most important item to emerge from the primary. The fact that the vote turned out as it did is, however, significant.

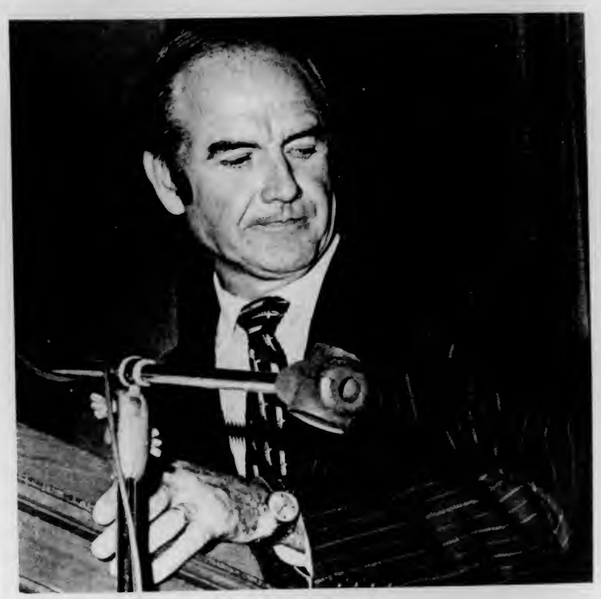
Hopefully, the credibility phase of the campaign is over for Muskie. In Florida, he will be entering an arena where one key issue, bussing, envelopes the whole campaign, an issue that he cannot afford to ignore. For the first time in this election year, the Maine Senator will be forced to take a stand. Whatever position he takes, he realizes that he will alienate some voters while attracting others. However, the one's he will hope to attract will already have been exposed to the views of Lindsay and Humphrey and Muskie will have to solicit some of these voters as well as a large percentage of the undecided group to finish in the second spot.

While Muskie can rightfully boast that he has spread himself across more of the primaries and made a greater nation-wide effort than any of his competitors, it may be possible that he has spread himself too thin. Only time and the results of the primaries will tell.

Of primary importance for Muskie right now is to maintain the image that he is the strongest candidate, in effect, that he is a winner. If this picture starts to fade, even Muskie's powerful organizations around the nation and his myriad committment from political leaders from coast to coast may not be able to save him. And remember, it took Richard Nixon eight years to rid himself of his losing image.

To put all that has gone before in the proper persepective, let us say once again that Edmund Muskie is the frontrunner for the Democratic Presidential nomination and the man for all the other competitors to beat. What he has going for him more than anything else, is that he has shown in all the polls that he, more than any of his Democratic rivals, could give President Nixon a battle for the Presidency. Many people have to figure that it is better to vote for Muskie, a candidate who can win, rather than another man who will be defeated in November. Muskie is banking on it.

The next few weeks should tell the story. Muskie will likely concentrate his efforts in the key states and try to solidify his position as frontrunner. Meanwhile, the other candidates will direct their attacks at him and may just knock each other off. At least, that's what the Muskie people hope will happen.



The major difficulty Muskie may face is not the other candidates but the fact that a lot of people consider him similar to the current President. As New York magazine put it, ". . . Ed Muskie is a kind of likable Richard Nixon. They are both men with a firm grip on America's past and no clear vision of a different future. But there is something real about Muskie . . ."

Yes, there is something real about Muskie but so far he has kept it hidden beneath the comparisons to Lincoln and his credibility campaign. Only his statement about a black running mate has seemed more than political strategy in recent months. Perhaps, Muskie's campaign has tried so hard to glorify the simple goodness of the man that it has lost the essential qualities of the Down-Easterner to the image makers. Muskie is simply not as effective on television as he is in person. If the medium is the message, then perhaps Muskie's whistle-stop campaign through Florida was done for a reason.

New Hampshire and Florida notwithstanding, the political future of Ed Muskie appear to be very bright, at least until November. If there is a contest between Muskie and Nixon, though, many will claim, as they did in 1968, that there is no choice.

If Muskie acts now, he can probably avert such an event from taking place. But the time has come for him to stop worrying about the image and to start giving some thought to the issues. The politics of trust must be exchanged for the politics of truth. Only then can Muskie make people believe that he offers alternatives to the present administration and to some of his competitors. If the New Hampshire primary has forced him to take such initiative, perhaps his campaign will once again reach the heights it had attained only a few weeks ago. Once the momentum builds, it may be difficult to stop the Muskie bandwagon.

"Since the days when the rail splitter from Illnois made tall and homely synonymous with honesty, every aspiring politician has made some effort to play Horatio Alger!!"

"Women In Revolt!"

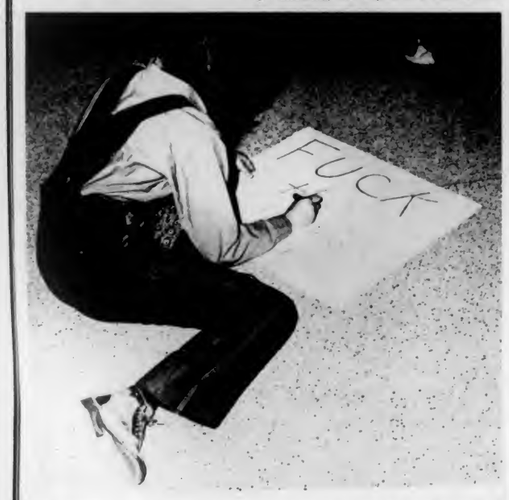
by FRANK M. BAGLIONE

In the short but fiery history of current radical movements in the United States, there is no group which has been as unstintingly ignorant of the need for proper organization and discipline as the women's liberationists. This resistence to the traditional means of organization, carried to the point of perversity, was, in part, responsible for the dismal outcome of last Wednesday's "Women's International Day" here at the University of Massachusetts.

"Women's International Day" began at 11:00 AM on the Amherst Town Commons when 24 women and three men began a march into the university campus. Small though they were, the numbers included all the elements that usually make up this kind of group. For the most part they were young women--neat, well-scrubbed coeds and slovenly, flea-bit street people. But there were also a couple of silver-haired ladies, older women who in their desire to remain with the young had abandoned maturity, discretion and dignity, the gifts of age. And as always, there were the men whose lack of balance and feelings of insufficiency cast them unceasingly into the camp of the discontented.

The women came into campus carrying signs which read, "I am not a Hole," and "We are lesbians and we are beautiful." As they walked through the campus center and student union buildings they chanted, "Free our sisters, Free ourselves, All you sexists go to hell." It was the same silly antics that most of us had begun to feel foolish about years ago. People in the buildings stopped eating their lunches to watch the marchers pass. The mood was one of humor. People reacted by laughing and turning to one another with smiles that were nearly blushes. They were embarrassed for this small band of women crying oppression to the people in the hamburger line.

As the women filed out the crowd applauded out of respect for people willing to suffer public humiliation. There was no ridicule--that would have been a cruel deed done to the defenseless.



The program that the women had planned was in itself sufficient cause for the day's failure--a one hour march followed by over three hours of speeches. No genuine speakers rose; merely a bunch of talkers. Dull, silly, repetitious, each confused set of chatter following the next until the ballroom crowd which had peaked at seventy-five persons dwindled down to hardly thirty. At the beginning a woman named "Tina" rose to say she would like some men to supervise an informal day care arrangement in the adjoining room so that the women would be free to attend to business. Three men, who were ultimately proven to be bright where they thought they were only being noble, sacrificed the speeches for children.

The first talker was Isabel Arnold of the Valley Women's Center. She was a greying, middle-aged woman who gave off an air of suburbia. Dressed in what can best be called a patrician's play suit, Mrs. Arnold treated her audience to stories of her meetings with Vietnamese women. Interesting topics included how North Vietnamese children were taught to like work. She did not say what field of work, but then that is not important, the statement was meant to say more about the North Vietnamese system vs. our own regardless of the fact that they are hardly comparable economically, socially or culturally.

After a brief ad for a "non-sexist" day care center recently established in the area, the proceedings moved ponderously towards one of its highlights. On the program it read, "Amy Salzman, daughter of Freida," much like the marquis at a theatre showing the sequel to a successful horror flick. Amy, daughter of Freida, turned out to be a thin young lady with kinky red hair and thick-rimmed glasses. She seems unsure of what her mother's problem was, but it all was boiled down to discrimination against women. The brightest part of her talk was when, in comparing her parents she said, "They got their education at the same time, they got their degrees together, they even lived together!" This exclamation was followed by some laughter and Amy, daughter of Freida, added with a blush, "being married."

The marchers take on the Campus Center. "No man with any sense of personal dignity and self-respect could remain a supporter of a movement so pregnant with hate."

A liberated miss makes her placard. "Cries of 'Male Chauvinist Pig' and 'Sexist Go To Hell' now display not only poor taste, but also childlessness. They belong in the rubbish heap along with 'Pinko' and 'Honky'."

Drama followed when Eileen Stewart of the Southwest Women's Center addressed the gathering. She was dressed in a green pant suit (everyone wore pants or long skirts) and looked like the type of person who, had she not discovered women's liberation, would have been beating at the sorority house doors. She told, somewhat emotionally, how she had suffered the loss of friends and an easy life to become a stalwart of the movement. It sounded like an essay on "How I Lost My Friends by Being Morally Correct." Yet if her testimony hinted at shallowness, it also was the most spirited of the afternoon. Unfortunately, Miss Stewart's energy was a brief spark in the damp.

As at all radical meetings, the Young Socialist Alliance offered a speaker. YSA prides itself on having a finger in every pie. A cheap panderer to all the different organizations, YSA looks for support and influence from any group that might help it attain power--Women's Lib, the black movement, the MOBE, anything, anyone can find a home in this socialists' Salvation Army. Representing YSA this time was Maggie Houghton, a matronly, sweet-smiling young lady. She is slightly incongruous in the role of a socialist, but she does exude the gentleness and kindness of a Salvation Army worker. Yet she leaves no doubt about the choice she has made when speaking about abortion. "It (abortion) is the major issue," Miss Houghton said, "We must control our bodies." No one pointed out, however, that by the time you are in need of an abortion you have already lost control of your body.

To lighten the modd a bit the comedy team of Shields and Penny was introduced. Lois Penny and Sonny Shields are two women working for the election of Shirley Chisholm as the first woman President of the United States. Davorting about the stage, the two casually and sometimes fervently told about their campaigning trials. At one point while Miss Shields was asking for contributions, Penny, then sitting in the audience, lept to her feet and cried, "Ask your aunts and uncles; get dollars, dimes, anything; get money!" And later in their routine Penny did a rather nice bit about the "Jockocracy" that dominates our TVs, complaining bitterly, like many a woman before her, about the constant barrage of sports programs on the air.

The activities of "Women's International Day" were coordinated by Mrs. Michael Best, wife of the economics professor who has been the center of controversies in previous years himself. Mrs. Best was reluctant to talk about the small turnout except to say she was surprised that the women at the University had not responded to the group's efforts. Perhaps Mrs. Best overestimated the womens' capacity for punishment, or perhaps she failed to see that she was slightly out of time. Some years back at the height of young people's "commitment stage," a day of activities such as these might have produced some spark, but today the demands seem hollow, there is no flint left to that great boulder of morality and concern which we rolled over and over the bad guys. Times, tactics and attitudes have changed.

A look at the groups that sponsored Amherst's Women's International Day should give some clue to how great these changes have been--The Valley Peace Center, the town of Amherst's righteous banded together to stand at a peace vigil every Sunday afternoon. The war, the world and the traffic passed them by. Support from the Valley Peace Center is like an endorsement from the Wendel Wilkie fan club. The Student Senate Committee on Women--as soon as the Student Senator's discovered there was an oppressed group that they hadn't given money, they set up this committee to try to generate interest in the women's issue in the hopes of an organization developing that would need funds for leaflets, buttons and abortions. Sometimes student senators must go around saying to themselves, "If only we were in the grown-ups Senate, then priorities would be set straight."

Then, of course, there is the Faculty Senate Women's Caucus. From Wednesday's turnout Mrs. Best seems to be the caucus. It is not clear if the faculty's women's caucus is an imitation of the student senate's women's committee or a creature of the latest fad in radical chic. Certainly it was the voraciousness with which the School of Education devours anything new that led to that department's sponsorship through its women's caucus. The school of ed is a fine playground and wonderful mother to any collection of individuals looking for a free ride.

A review of these groups brings us to the seonc reason for the day's poor turnout. That is, behond the inability of the radical women's groups to organize ffectively, the women's issue is clearly not in the hands of these groups any longer. Like the civil rights movement, like the peace movement, the struggle for an adjustment of the system in the favor of women has fallen to the liberal politicians. It is, in the sense of any kind of participatory democracy, out of the hands of the people. Whatever is to be done about job discrimination, about abortion, about equal rights, will be done in Washington or in the state capitals. We have been saturated with demonstrations and that concept and tactic needs to lie follow, to undergo a period of regeneration.

It is unfortunate, for the radical women, that their movement peaked at a time when the great reform movements of the last decade were reaching their maturity. The fire and ferocity of the black and anti-war movements had nearly been spent by 1970, the year the women's movement began to jell. At that time radical feminism was characterized by an overweening bitterness toward everything male, i.e., most all of our existence since men are an important part of our society. It is here that they developed two of their fatal flaws.

The first error the women made was, as previously mentioned, their rejection of the traditional method of organization--leadership, loyalty and the division of labor. Since most institutions are male run, leadership meant male leadership, loyalty therefore was to the male leaders, and the division of labor gave lower order jobs to women. This, the women said, was dehumanizing and oppressive. Equality could only come through equality in the group--the sharing of responsibility and all types of work (hence the concept of "non-sexist" day care centers where men and women rear the child). This type of reasoning was irrational and displayed the radicals infatuation with Communism. Rather than change the bad water in the perfectly good bowl, they dumped out the water and threw the bowl away.

The second major error the radical women made (and one of their own, Betty Freidan, recently chastised them for this) was the ease with which they slipped from hating the male dominated system to hating males. The arrogance of the women in dealing with men, not allowing men to take part in their work, demanding men perform only menial tasks, and generally exhibiting an animosity to males in their actions and speech, soon produced the inevitable result--men became the enemy. No man with any sense of personal dignity and self- respect could remain a supporter of a movement so pregnant with hate. Many women in the fever of their new found freedom barely regretted the men's desertion, for by this time they had embarked on the ultimate women's liberation trip--lesbianism.

If the movement at its peak was virulent and sordid it was at least spirited at that time. Hate and bitterness and abandonment can be powerful unifiers for a while. But only so many women could be captured by this, the rest still wanted their men, still believed in the system, or were not discontented with their position. Left with only constructive goals, many radical women lost their spirit, many of the issues became bogus ones, and if all white males were not the enemy then much of the focus was lost. The rally this Women's International Day was much the less man-hating and bitter than previous ones, and correspondingly less spirited.

The rhetoric, however, has not been toned down along with the man-hating. Cries of "male chauvinst pig" and "sexists go to hell" now display not only poor taste, but also childishness. They belong on the rubbish heap along with "pinko" and "honky." Where once these epithets stung they now only evoke embarrassment for the person spitting them out. People are no longer intimidated by name calling.

The women's movement will no doubt continue to make gains for its cause, but like its predecessors in the civil rights movement it will have to begin to do so more quietly--and it will have to learn to compromise. The period of moral arrogance is passing, the generations are changing. As we become older we gain insight into the desire of our elders to maintain traditions and "things as they were." More emphasis must be placed on how to shoulder the burdens our race or sex places upon us rather than attempting to throw them off as if they were imposed upon us by one generation of incredibly evil men. Justice and freedom are not achieved by condemning and negating the past, even if this were possible, nor by a fanciful leap into the future.

Women's International Day in Amherst was an embarrassment, an anacronism thrust into a changed 1972. It was an attempt to sustain our adolescence for yet another semester. And that is what made the result so pathetic the fact that so many women refused to come out and play, that some had chosen to become a grown women, and not "sisters" any more.

The male contingent. "And as always, there were the men whose lack of balance and feelings of insufficiency cast them unceasingly into the camp of the discontented."

OTIS RUSH

The word "underrated" is often used to describe musicians who have talent but haven't achieved the fame which they deserve. If the word "underrated" can be used as an adjective for any musician in this country, then, it is applicable to Otis Rush.

Otis Rush was born in Philadelphia, Mississippi on April 29, 1934. Although Otis learned to play at a very early age it wasn't until 1948 when he moved with his family to Chicago, that Otis began to take playing seriously. In 1953, at the age of nineteen, Otis formed his first band and landed a gig at the Club Alibi. Willie Dixon persuaded Otis to sign a recording contract in 1956 with Cobra records. This contract resulted in 16 sides by Otis, including "I Can't Quit You Baby" (recorded by Led Zeppelin) and "All Your Love." (done by John Mayall with Eric Clapton on guitar). Cobra records folded in 1958 and Otis signed with Chess records, but he recorded only ten sides in the next twelve years. Recently, Otis recorded an entire album produced by Mike Bloomfield and Nick Gravenites for Cotillion records. Vanguard records has also recorded several sidesby Otis.

Otis has developed into a highly imaginative guitarist. He plays left-handed holding the guitar backwards and upside down, but not reversing the strings to correspond with his left-handedness. Often Otis performs very unique-sounding chord solos. At times he plays single note runs, using his guitar to counter or embellish his superb voice. B.B. King is famous for playing in this manner.

Otis Rush has gone virtually unnoticed by blues fans in this country for several reasons. Since Otis has seldom toured, few people outside of Chicago are aware of the brilliance which he clearly shows when he performs live. His most recent records are not, on the whole, indicative of his talents. Although many of his Cobra sides are excellent, they are scarce-only being currently available on an English album.

The Otis Rush Blues Band will perform at the S. U. Ballroom at 8 p.m. on Monday, March 13.

MIMI FARINA & TOM JANS

The warm-up act for the individual: Mimi Farina and Tom Jans. Their music is good and strong with traditions of folk music and emotional activism behind it.

Mimi Farina is the singer-songwriter-guitarist whose past is now the legend of Richard and Mimi Farina, while Tom Jans is a singer-songwriter-guitarist from California whose background is of Sixties college turbulence. He is young and his time is coming.

Mimi's sister, Joan Baez introduced Tom to Mimi in 1970. Mimi was at that time beginning to write songs and looking for a partner to perform them with. Tom at this time was writing his own songs, performing them at clubs, coffee houses and benefits.

The pair immersed themselves in the task of making music for people for over half a year beginning at the Big Sur Folk Festival. "We spent 6 or 7 months singing in clubs on both the East and West Coasts," says Tom, "It built a good foundation for us before we recorded with A & M." Both Mimi and Tom are individual songwriters. Mimi has been developing the talent recently, while Tom is a little more seasoned, having written about 300 songs before turning twenty.

The music of Tom and Mimi is not traditional, but it has its share of roots. Both are fine guitarists whose influences include folk, rock and country styles. Mimi's clear and lovely voice blends well with Tom's for harmonies while the guitars create melodic interplays.

Mimi Farina and Tom Jans will appear at the Bluewall on Wednesday, March 15, at 9:00 P.M. They will play two show sets rather than two individual shows. Six hundred tickets will be sold entitling the bearers to stay for the entire evenings entertainment. The tickets are $1.50 for students and $2.00 for non-students and may be obtained in room 821 Campus Center from 1:00 to 3:00 P.M. Only people with advanced tickets will be allowed in until 9:15 P.M., at which time standing room and additional space tickets will be sold. Do not miss these two fine performers.

Spirit Mere Ghost of Former Self

BY MIKE KOSTEK

(FEEDBACK--Spirit--Epic--KE31175 Time: 34:38)

One of the most inventive and imaginative bands that existed in the exciting, embryionic period of the late 60's was a strange, obscure band called Spirit. Looking back on this period, it now seems an incredibly active, flowering time of musical innovation highlighted by Sgt. Pepper, and including the early days of so many fine groups. Country Joe & The Fish, Jefferson Airplane, Grateful Dead, Canned Heat, Quicksilver Messenger Service (what promise they held!), The Mothers Of Invention, Buffalo Springfield and more, I'm sure. This was a time of musical exploration in which the listener felt that these people were out to create a new music, which contrasts so jarringly with today's period of rampant trendism.

Spirit was, and rightly so, one of the lesser-known groups of this period. I have a pet theory which has arisen by watching their album progress and it goes like this: they made one cloudy, half-realised album, Spirit, replete with fresh, clear harmonies, well-done melodic changes and progressions, and some good songs.

Spirit came closest to realizing their potential in their second album, The Family That Plays Together with fine songs, played well, nicely enhanced by some carefully chosen sound effects, presenting a wide range of rock, pop and ingenious conbinations of both. While Spirit had only moderate sales, Family That Plays sold much better, due in large part to the single success of one of the songs on the album, "I Got A Line On You", which still gets golden oldie airplay. Spirit's songs were mostly five or six minutes long. The Family's were mostly under five minutes, and on their next album, Clear Spirit, they were shorter yet. The boys were turning away from the adventurous type of songs that marked their first two albums. Of course sometimes their song experiments wouldn't quite work, but you still had to give them credit for trying.

Clear Spirit was all right, but they were trying too hard for another hit single which would hopefully "break" the band in terms of nationwide exposure. The final chapter in the original Spirit story took place last year with an album called The Twelve Dreams of Dr. Sardonicus. Despite its promising title it wound up as 1971's tenth biggest disappointment, according to last year's Kibitzer Rock Poll. Almost nothing worked out right on Twelve Dreams, and the album failed artistically as well as financially, due to the fact that it seemed that they tried to make every track a Top 40 hit.

In any case, you could take two or three cuts from these four albums and make one terrific record.

Whether from running out of inspiration or money, Spirit broke last year into two groups. Ed Cassidy, the drummer, and John Locke, keyboards, stayed in with the name Spirit, while Jay Ferguson, the group's main songwriter, and Mark Andes went into a group called Jo Jo Gunne. The other member, and the one with the best name, Randy California, hasn't yet checked in with anybody or anything.

So it was left for Ed and John to carry on Spirit. However, time has shown us that the drummer and/or the keyboard player do not dominate any group, unless your name is Ginger Baker and/or Brian Auger.

Therein lies the difference between our two Spirits. Two brothers, Al and J. Christian Staehley were inserted into the bass and lead guitar spots respectively, with Al singing lead with J. Christian doing adequate backups. And since Al wrote 61/2 of the ten songs, leaving John Locke with one sad verse and two nice instrumentals, Feedback comes off more like a Staehley Brothers record. The only remnant of the beautiful electric music adventure that Spirit started is in Locke's three numbers that feature that wonderful old-time Spirit touch, the linear fuzz-tone guitar lines.

As for the Staehleys performance, J. Christian plays a simple lead that combines with his brothers vocals as the dominant sound on the record.

The Spiritual Charisma of John McLaughlin

By KENNETH SULIN

(The Mahavishnu Orchestra with John McLaughlin--Inner Mounting Flame--Columbia KC 31067)

There is such an overabundance of run-of-the-mill performers these days that one hardly knows which albums to buy and which not to buy. As you stroll into a record store you'll look around and probably find yourself leaving with an album by a standard everyday group so as not to waste your three and a half dollars on an unknown record. The talent usually of the well-known groups not much more than half-rate and the only reason they've lucked out by being backed by a wealthy Producer. What is trying to be said here is many of the less talented musicians have dollar signs on their pajamas, whereas, the true perfectionists and best qualified for such high praise remain in obscurity.

Perhaps the name of John McLaughlin has never crossed paths with you before, but here you may become acquainted with one of the finest guitar players living today.

McLaughlin began, as a child, with classical music. He later moved his way to jazz and yet later found his position with a guitar and blues. Although still a teenager, he traveled to London only to play his first recording sessions with Ginger Baker, Jack Bruce, and Graham Bond. Tony Williams then gave John a call from New York. The next day Miles Davis used John for more studio work and finally Tony Williams' Lifetime was formed. McLaughlin caught on quickly and started, as many do, working on his own solo albums which received little public recognition outside his ring of admirers. Finally, McLaughlin has assembled a group he calls the Mahavishnu Orchestra. Their first effort on Columbia, The Inner Mounting Flame, has now become one of the most intricate and concise examples of popular music found in any collection of the industry thus far.

The music of Mahavishnu Orchestra can be classified as electric jazz; then again, at times it even defies jazz almost punching and jabbing at it from the outside periphery. For a group that has only played together for eight months, McLaughlin has certainly been well equipped in practice of combining his guitar with his bassist Rick Laird, violinist Jerry Goodman formerly of Flock, drummer Billy Cobham and pianist Jan Hammer. The sound is probably better labeled, the "new jazz" since it is the junction of classical, blues, rock and non-western music all integrated into a single unit.

The aspect of McLaughlin's presentation that has not yet been mentioned is his deep immersion in Indian philosophy. Through this and only this does his music speak. Mahavishnu is the name of an Indian cosmic god and it means great divine compassion, justice and strength. This name was given to McLaughlin by his spiritual teachers.

The Mahavishnu Orchestra does not play merely for listening pleasure but rather to communicate spiritual beliefs which McLaughlin states as the sole ingredient of any sound they produce. Singly he doesn't try only to proficiently play his guitar, but to use it as a basis of presentation to the Supreme Being. The relation of spiritual beliefs with music results in an uncanny absorbtion of energy which directs McLaughlin further and further toward his goal, the search for the highest Ideal.

Each of the eight selections on The Inner Mounting Flame is a step closer to McLaughlin's communications of spirit and music. The songs are fast and loud, deeply religious and shiftingly unusual. One cut entitled "The Noonward Race" is appropriately named carrying on a rapidly excelling pace in which McLaughlin and Goodman stab each other with their breaking rhythms and torrid excursions.

Nevertheless, in "A Lotus on Irish Streams" we can also find the solemn and serene touched with a very, very soft violin and acoustic. The Mahavishnu Orchestra is complete; every possible type of music, every arrangement, is tracked into one intersection of tightly knit recordings, something that has exhausted the extent of musical aspects on two sides of an album.

John McLaughlin

McLaughlin's music gives off certain wave effects, closely meshed patterns of sound that stream together and blend to perfection. The individual instruments fit together like pieces of a puzzle. They are taut and nearly unbreakable so that The Inner Mounting Flame becomes a collection of each instrument prodding the other four and resulting in overwhelming and progressions and derivations.

John McLaughlin is easily recognized as a master with a guitar. Some think he's the best, some think one of the best. However, he is excellent. His relations with the Indian religion have all but enhanced his sound as his music repeatedly becomes more and more alive--he is continually striving for a goal using his only known means, that of music. As McLaughlin combines his profession with spiritual content he states: "If you aspire for the highest ideal, everything else will come."

Eulogy of an Unknown

BY BILL DENSMORE

Peter Bardens "Write My Name in the Dust" (Verve Forcast)

This is Peter Barden's second album to appear in the U.S., the first one, "The Answer" was released about a year ago. If you haven't yet heard of this young English organist it's not surprising--"the Answer" received little airplay and is hard to get. Nevertheless, if Mr. Bardens meets with rather limited commercial success you have only to wait, he won't be put off forever.

"Write My Name in the Dust" is built on the performance of one man.

"Write My Name in the Dust" is built on the performance of one man and his virtuosity on the organ. Mr. Bardens produced, wrote, and sings all the songs on it. I cannot imagine anyone else performing his songs, they demand his unique style. Bardens' organ soars and echoes at a speed which is almost impossible to follow, and with the help of equally adroit guitar work by Vic Linton, the album achieves an ethereal quality. If it is possible to assign music to a time of day then this album certainly should be kept for the darkest night.

"North End Road", an instrumental, opens the album. It is a minute and twenty-five seconds of humor with a piano on each track and a couple of slide trombones, and serves as a comical introduction to "Write My Name in the Dust", the title track. On this cut Bardens uses a chorus of five well-scored women and an organ sounding like it was lifted from the first Led Zepplin album, to create a potent composition which varies dynamically from comparative calm to cathedral-like heights. "Down So Long", "Tear Down the Wall", and "Feeling High" are showcases for Bardens' raucous organ, and with the exception of "Feeling High" are coherent, listenable songs. "Feeling High" is the only song besides "Write My Name in the Dust" in which Peter Bardens uses a female chorus, but in "Feeling High" the chorus is nothing more than synchronized screams.

On "Sweet Honey Wine" Bardens uses a vocal style remarkably similar to Mick Jaggar around 1965. "Simple Song" is a bawdy English drinking song – or at least a polished attempt to imitate the style, and sounds rather like "Mother's Lament" by Cream.

Lyrically, Peter Bardens is simplistic and unpoetic, telling prose stories to music, and even if what he says is prophetic, its impact is lost, because this is overwhelmingly an album of music not words. Recommended highly for organ freaks and other heavies.

Receivers: The Easy Way To Hi-Fi

by FRANK JOHNSON

In an earlier column, the distinction between a tuner (a device which extracts transmitted information from the airwaves but does not amplify it) and a receiver (a self-contained unit which incorporates both a tuner and an amplifier on the same chassis) was made. In this column, it was implied that there was some confusion between a simple radio and a receiver; the former rarely was of hi-fi quality and there was a great cost differential between them. However, the previous article made no pains to fully evaluate a modern stereo receiver, and therein lies the reason for today's column.

If one were to make an analysis of the hi-fi market these days, he would probably make the following conclusions: 1.) more people own a receiver than separate components; 2.) more people own a cassette recorder than a reel-to-reel type, and 3.) more people own a changer or automatic turntable than a manual model. The inference from these 3 conclusions would be that people more and more buy convenience and packaged quality rather than assembling a system by themselves. With conclusions 2 and 3, the assumption is certainly valid. Previous articles explained why manual turntables and reel-to-reel recorders are apt to be better than changers and cassettes, in terms of ultimate quality. However, this prejudice begins to fall flat when we return to receivers. In the last 5 years especially, the quality of receivers has steadily risen, and at the moment it looks as if the receiver is apt to certainly rival, and sometimes better, separate components.

The reasons for this improvement can be seen through a brief historical sketch. About a decade ago, when stereo was just becoming popular, most audio components were designed with vacuum tubes. If a preamp, tuner, and power amp were assembled on one chassis, the resulting unit tended to be rather bulky, and not much space was reserved for the sort of components that gave such a set real quality. These receivers were costly, and not really competitive with separate components. However, about 5 years ago tube-type receivers began to disappear from the market, and as transistors became less expensive, receivers became not only less complex and lighter, but the cost began to go down. This was the approximate time when receivers' sales began to top those of separate components. Since then, this trend has never really reversed itself.

The obvious question: why are receivers as popular as they are, should be apparent from their very nature. Because these devices incorporate three discrete units on a single chassis, they can share a common power supply and mounting, which greatly decreases the cost of the unit. Interconnecting cables, which frequently get loose and interfere with the operation of a stereo set, are all incorporated within the receiver. Since space is always a problem with stereo, a receiver reduces the allotments and allows more room for a tape unit, changer, or records, if it is available. A receiver allows purchasing a tuner at the time an amplifier is desired, and in many cases the cost is not much more than the amplifier alone. In recent years a number of receivers have appeared on the market in the higher-priced category that have bettered performance of discrete (separate) components 5 years ago, vis-a-vis high power, good tuner performance, and control flexibility.

These benefits explain receivers' popularity, but they do not denote shortcomings. In the first place, many audiophiles do not do very much radio listening, as tapes and records have usually higher quality sound (with the possible exception of a live FM broadcast). This should be apparent when we examine multiplex performance, or stereo transmissions. To keep background noise at a minimum, the receiver should have access to a sensitive, directional antenna, which not always is available. Because multiplex is an inherently weaker, noisier signal than mono FM transmission, distances over about 40 miles from the transmitter result in noisy, distorted stereo performance. Many fringe-area listeners don't bother with a receiver for these reasons, and instead invest their money wisely in a records- or tape-only system.

Also, no mention has been made of receiver breakdown, which infortunately is still likely to occur. Let's assume the tuner section is at fault. The owner must then part with the entire set until it is fixed, and in the meantime he can do no hi-fi listening. With separate components, a defective tuner can merely be disconnected without disturbing the other sources. Further, because a receiver's power supply is limited, amplifier performance is usually (but not always) slightly inferior to a separate power supply, a receiver's distortion will usually exhibit a sharp rise in low bass frequencies at RMS or clipping levels, if plotted on a graph. Audio magazine publishes graphs for this very reason. Some receivers also have a tendency to rise in distortion at very low power levels, especially the lower-priced models without a regulated power supply. The obvious problem- skimping on one section to allow economical operation of the others- can still plague receivers. For audiophiles who are concerned about these problems, either a very expensive and elaborate receiver is the answer, or else separate components.

Still, a receiver is apt to be your best bet if you're on a budget. If you own no hi-fi gear and want to buy a complete system, you can save a lot by buying a system designed around a receiver. Portability is the biggest plus here; travelling with hi-fi virtually demands a receiver. But keep these ideas in mind: if the hi-fi system you want is a temporary medium, and you plan to do some, upgrading in the future, don't buy a receiver. If you do, it means shucking an entire system if all you want is better tuner performance, or more power. Also, if you're really on a budget and want to gradually elaborate on your system by increments, start out with a phono system and work upward. It's usually the most economical to begin with, and you won't be caught "short" if you plan to buy other gear later.

Purchasing a receiver calls for judicious buying, for you will want to make sure a model has not compromised on any one section in the unit. It should have good FM performance but at the same time adequate amplifier power for your needs. Always keep your ultimate requirements in mind; don't be swayed by attractive deals or a multitude of knobs and dials. Remember that any good audio component should have a liberal warranty, which must include both parts and labor if it is to be of any significance. Because labor is usually the most costly part of the warranty if anything goes wrong, it should be paid for by the manufacturer if trouble arises during the warranty period. Read your warranties carefully; some manufacturers have a reputation at stake and want to offer very liberal warranties to maintain this reputation. Anything less than a minimum of one year's guarantee on both parts and labor infers either an unstable unit or else an unscrupulous manufacturer. Other things to consider in this area are: location of the nearest warranty service center, availability of parts in the area, reputation of servicing, etc. Your local audio dealer is best qualified to answer these questions for you.

At this time I'll give a preview of "coming attractions". If you're growing weary of all this theory, stay tuned for the issue appearing 2 weeks from now, entitled: Maintenance and home servicing. (The British are fond of the description: "Do It Yourself", and abbreviate these 3 words in the form of "DIY".) Next week we'll look at the 4- channel craze, and see whether or not it really is a "craze". Some more articles on equipment setup will follow, and towards the end of the year we'll have a question and answer column, in case any of you run into trouble. Regarding this final offer: please don't phone the MDC office for this information. Bring the letters in to the office and leave them in charge of Bob Nesti. The ones most pertinent to the general listening audience will be answered.

That Happy Thing Called "The Boy Friend"

The Boy Friend adapted from the stage musical of Sandy Wilson and directed by Ken Russell, starring Twiggy, Christopher Gable, Tommy Tune, and Max Adrian.

Ken Russell is a director in perpetual motion whose films succeed in being the most imaginative and stylistically unique of any director to appear in the past few years. With The Boy Friend he has reached his apogee thus far with an endearing vehicle for exhibiting his brash blend of characters and situations and his unique cinematic style. This campy, nostalgic musical is an ingeniously designed and genuinely entertaining "pastiche" of the great Busby Berkely film musicals of the Thirties that adroitly pokes fun at the stage musicals of the Twenties and the film musicals of the Thirties.

These decades are what we consider "camp" today and it's campy ingenuity which makes The Boy Friend into such an enjoyable spectacle. Camp, by definition, is the affectionate ridicule of a certain style or mode of behavior now gone stale or extinct. It mimics the popular culture of a given period. The music, the style of clothing, the popular arts all lend themselves perfectly to "camp" for they are only transient, yet reveal what we best may wish to remember about a period. Films lend themselves quite well to "camp", celluloid can capture a past reality and vividly restore it as no other media is able. The Twenties, The Thirties, and The Forties are decades in which popular culture can be camped simply because we have a means, through film, to capture a near perfect rendering of their specific attributes.

Yet, these times, places, and personalities are beyond our grasp and can be at best vicariously experienced. Instead we can only imitate them. The Thirties, as any devotee of "camp" can attest, are the most evocative and remarkable decade in film history. It was the period when the great studios had their heyday and the star system firmly entrenched itself into what is now legend. The stars themselves made it through the beaurocratic, stifling monolith studios and proved their own individual worth; Bette Davis, Humphrey Bogart, Katherine Hepburn, Greta Garbo, Mae West, W.C. Fields all had their initial or greatest successes during this period. We "camp" them today because we respect them so much.

We also best remember the form that emplified the era, the film musical and its transformation into an unique cinematic form. The credit belongs mainly to one man, Busby Berkeley and The Boy Friend is a Valentine to that man's genius. In fact Russell blatantly plagarizes memorable moments from Berkeley's best work to accentuate this conscious memory. There are, for instance, the girls dancing on an giant spinning phonograph in one of the numerous recreations of the Berkeley production numbers used throughout. The moment was done before by Berkeley in 42nd Street, when Dick Powell sang "I'm Young And Healthy"; Russell even went as far as imitating the final shot of the sequence with a long pan of the chorus line seen between their legs ending with the two leads, here Twiggy and Christopher Gable, lying on the floor staring at the camera in apparent romantic bliss.

These recreations are more than loving ridicules of the original, they are cleverly designed into a charming, unique entertainment. The Boy Friend succeeds because rather than an imitative mash of cliched techniques, Ken Russell has reinterpreted the much abused musical form. Where others, such as the current horror Fiddler On The Roof, are inflated for no other reason than conscious expansion, this film uses a simple basis, that of a cliched backstage plot, and builds from it an intricate cinematic design. There is a largeness here, but never does it become clumsy or grosse. Russell moves the film so that expanse becomes nuance and the his ingenious synthesis of stage action and film techniques is always fascinating.

Russell was astute enough to realize the frothy musical satire of the Twenties style musical Sandy Wilson wrote wasn't quite strong enough to stand alone. Too much of its cleverness depends upon intimacy and rapport between actor and audience. Film is emotionally cold and such a static and mechanical a medium as to inhibit this communion. Instead contact must be made in other ways and here Russell's virtues as a director become so apparent. His camera never stops with its assault of striking images. Few current directors can frame an image with such style and balance. Throughout the singular images are quite stunning and they prove Russell's ability to utilize all the components of film to their fullest. The colors, the production design, the costume and brash juxtoposition of light and dark, make for cinematically the most interesting film of the year so far. Russell's interest are visual, not thematic, and with this simply mindless entertainment the overworked themes which marred his other films are not present to hinder his visual brilliance.

Everything here is obvious, simple, and very cleverly--assembled. The Boy Friend is essentially a film--within--a--film about a production of a play and its projected film version. The loose story concerns a touring third--rate theatrical company touring the British provinces with their production of a Twenties musical called The Boy Friend. One matinee the company learns that the leading Hollywood musical mogul Victor DeThrill will be in the House Box prospecting the show. Unfortunately that afternoon the show's star (adeptly played in a cameo role by Glenda Jackson) breaks a leg and the company's all--around understudy and production assistant Polly Brown (Twiggy) must go on in her place. This plot has been down before, numerous times, in nearly backstage ever filmed from On With The Show through Dames At Sea. This girl, of course, is in love with the show's leading man, here played by Christopher Gable, whose interests seem in the other chorines in the company.

Polly's stage debut is at first shaky as she is harrassed by the dishy chorus girls and pushed about by the show's director--producer. Finally she settles down and the plot literally becomes non--existance. Instead we watch the inanity of the play they are performing through a number of ways. First there's the stage action itself performed with all the hamminess the cast can muster. Once they learned that DeThrill was in the box, they continually attempt to upstage each other to impress him; the tap dancing duo become warring factions, the bit part players saboutage the leads and take over, as cunning deceit in the best theatrical tradition holds sway.

DeThrill remains unimpressed, he is more interested in his own virtuosity as a director and it manifests itself throughout in the numerous dream sequences Russell employs. Here we see Russell's ingenuity at its sharpest as the pleasant stage action is transformed into glorious extravanza with the stylized Berkeley techniques.

Somewhere in the montage of stage and screen effects the plot meanders along: Polly gets her man then loses her man, both on stage and off. The actors try their damndest to impress DeThrill, finally being upstaged by the low--keyed Polly, and DeThrill imagines some of the neatest cinema effects found on celluloid since the Thirties.

The performances are a genial blend of ham acting and professionalism. Tommy Tune is one of the most affalable performers on the current screen, his performance as the show's lead dancer is both warm and wonderful. As the show's leading man Christopher Gable is much better than his wasted role in Russell's earlier The Music Lovers. Here he is charming and unassuming and dances with the skill only an ex-- Royal Ballet star has ability.

The true stars of The Boy Friend are Russell and Twiggy. The young lady, in her first film role, has what best can be called a natural charm and an affectionate screen presence. The part of Polly is hardly demanding but is perfectly geared for Twiggy's talents. She sings pleasantly enought, dances even better, and presents a welcome, unexpected, and captivating screen personality. But even she is eclipse by the brilliance of Ken Russell. His touch is found in every frame and never bears down upon the viewer. Instead we have consistantly unique, imaginative and delightful cinema. The colors, the sets, the costumes, the striking juxtoposition of images are all work to a stunning end. The Boy Friend may be the last word in Camp, a super extravanganza of imaginative cinematic hijinks, and the first work of British director Ken Russell to rise above the mundane and banal.

Celebration : A Disasterous Masquerade

By JOSEPH Y. ARSENAULT

Celebration

Written by Tom Jones and Harvey Scmidt (better known for The Fantasticks and I Do! I Do!, directed by Judith Anderson - starred in order of major appearance Frank Anderson, Hugh Copeland, Susan Heuck, David Hopcroft and Gary Blumsick.

Celebration is a sophomoric attempt at interpolating modern reality. Comments on the human condition with insipid lyrics, mediocre tunes, over worked themes, and terrible puns exhumed from the debris of the forgotten fifties. It shouts out the problems of our existence, it introduces stock cardboard characters and pretends to call them symbols for the modern man. Celebration is poor theatre through and through. at the Campus Center, it became a disastrous mascarade, suffice it to say - a forged presentation of a terrible play.

The play begins in the dark around a primeval fire, surrounded by the players who are gyrating to the opening melody "Celebration." The lights come up, the ecstatic clapping gets harder, the festivities begin competing with the Piano and drum- which for this time is being able to shout over to the audience the garbled lyrics. Miss Tolka's tie died jump suits have the curious effect of emphasizing the worst part of the casts' fleshy anatomies and overplaying the many "succulent" derrieres.

The script, a confrontation of overdone stock characters, presents a Peter Pan as Orphan, a cheap Marilyn Monroe as Angel, Scrooge as Alexander J. Rich; all orchestrated by a sneaky narrator-charlatan-figure in this play called Potemkin. The first act done in the round (which has a measure of extreme difficulty) proceeds to introduce us to a poor little orphan boy lost in the big city searching for his garden--believing to have special grace from the Sun and wearing the Eye of God around his neck. Potemkin in black, the man about town and the world, jack of all sorts of realities, becomes his self elected mentor teaching Orphan all about the big deceitful city.

The tone is cynical: nothing is left to irony or intelligence since we are told this valuable information at the beginning of the second act. The Orphan, in a moment of prayer finds Angel, a striptease blond seductress in an electric red jumpsuit with peek-a-boo holes all up her side, yearning to be somebody. Crabby, egocentric Rich appears on the scene, gruff and grin obnoxiously yelling out "I'm bored, bored, bored." to which I raised my manhattan toasting, "Here's two of us."

The grand financier who made his fortune in falsies and artificial flowers hasn't felt a thing in years and finds himself confronted with death, impotence, and fear grumbling "You know what kid, I haven't had an erection in 25 years--(poor man!).

Nevertheless to our astonishment, we discover that he and Orphan are two sides of the same existence or might we say

Members of the Lion Share's Company rehearse Celebration.

"before and after" Potemkin in order to make poor Rich feel something beside himself decides that Orphan and Angel should play act a young lovers duet hoping to rekindle the fires in the old man.

"The Love Song" is dynamic, emotional and poignant. Orphan and Angel dance and sing together artfully while Rich sings of something "tickling" within. Powerful, subtle, effective. The dawning sexuality grows in Orphan, soft tenderness tones down Angels brassy hustler image and even childish Rich mellows.

All this erupts into psychological problems for everyone when Rich, flaming, steals the girl from Orphan, flooding her with pearls and money. Orphan is shattered, having "mysteriously" fallen in love. Pining, Potemkin rescues our hero, giving him Angel's tender lovenote. The script has returned to its original poor humor pushing at us this cheap vaudevillian human "You never know how the tricks turn out until the second half."

The second act is situated in the lost garden of the orphanage and begins with Orphan and Angel singing, "I'm so happy we each got what we wanted" (which we all know is obviously ironic). The choreography, as it was throughout most of the play, is simple, basically a threestep back and across the stage, madmilling about or following the leader. The action of the play never surmounts the difficulties of theater in the round; sections of the audience see nothing but backs for many prolonged sequences. Rich kicks Orphan out "on his ass", defoliates the place, destroys it with his "wintry" influence, which he symbolically representes. (Of course, Orphan is Spring.) Potemkin becomes Rich's right hand man, replacing the limp-wristed, gypsy ear-ringed interior designer; (These walking cardboard characters are just too much!)

Rich now decked in his white winter long underwear showing his bloated stomach and appropriate figleaf is ready for the action at his new year's eve party. His henchmen entertain him with a wild orgy which gets chaotic enough so that even Rich can no longer endure it. We proceed to an interesting scene around a human mirror where Rich sees himself as the orphan, but Father Time abruptly returns in the guise of a masked Potemkin. Orphan having watched all this from the outskirts is ready to fight for the right. He tries to convert Potemkin and the rest of Rich's followers by imploring them to "believe anything for all we can dream can be." After apathy and decadence, the force of romantic idealism rallies to a giant confrontation with harsh reality, youth pitted against old age, dreams against schemes, innocence against experience, in an incongruous sword duel between Orphan and Rich which is difficult to understand given the pre-established modern setting. Suddenly feeling a spasm, Rich drags Angel away to his retreat screaming that he has won by eminent domain. The mirrors close in on him, his deluded self image disappears, he sees his own decrepitude and finally death claims another victim in a pathetic and disgusting shrieking. Alas, we are returned to the dark primeval scene that started this misplay, Orphan and Angel are magically reconciled, wondering about the external reality "out there". The chorus of Celebration starts up again. It's over!

The play is simplistic. The puns are what remains of the fifties, with the script too mediocre to be believed existensial. The questions about modern reality are badly posed, if at all, the play's conscious effort to present the forces of evil through the tired trite and tedious metaphor of money ends in stereotypical depictions of good and bad. In a more sophisticated theater, this play belongs in kindergarten, for it ends up being a very poor morality musical preaching, screeching and not in any way teaching.

Frank Anderson (Potemkin) imitates with his powerful barritone voice a cartoon crook. His voice carries through many of the chorus songs, his portrayal of the wily narrator is entertaining, bringing to life many of the poor puns with fine facial expressions and humorous timing. Unfortunately, he suffers from the piano forte and his lyrics are lost in the poor beat. He seems to be a powerful force integrating and keeping the cast together.

Hugh Copeland (Orphan) sang wonderfully, his pleasing tenor was perfectly cast for the role of the innocent school boy, inexperienced in the ways of the world. He carried the illusion convincingly, but he too was often lost in the wild medleys between the piano and the cast. His performance was most beautiful during the Lovesong; his provocative and tender voice was moving.

Susan Heuck (Angel) sang breathily, and was able to adequately project the emotions of her role which demanded exaggeration. Her hands brushing through her long blond hair, her gusty walk, her earthiness were convincing.

David Hopcroft (Rich) shrieked, his hoarse singing though inherent to the role, grated on my nerves. His portrayal of the evil force of money was more than enough, it surpassed the character. He seemed confident, poised and experienced enough to project the pathetic image of the character by overplaying all stereotypes. He was Scrooge, grating, nerve wrecking but not a totally disappointing performer.

The chorus supported adequately, their gyrations and gesticulations were to be expected. The Paino sent migraines throughout the audience, upstaging all the performances.

If God is dead as is suggested in this play, then everything is permitted, and I suppose this play is what results. Nothing much can salvage a poor script, but overdoing the roles becomes bad caricature in poor taste, to Judith Anderson and the cast--maybe next time.

Poor Richard's Puzzle

Cross A Clockwork Orange With A Backward Bartleby

Weekend

By MARY LOU GORDON and BOB NESTI

Music

Amherst Folklore Center

Tonite there will be a Contra Dance with the Canterbury Orchestra, featuring Dudley Laufinar as called.

Thursday night, March 16 at 8:00 the center will feature Geoff and Maria Muldaur, former members of the Jim Kweskin Jug Band. ($).

Beggers In Company

The latest group to present live musical comedy readings will perform this Sunday night in the Rathskellar at 7:30 and 10 and this week's show is Cabaret. Cabaret opened in November of 1967 and was acclaimed as one of the most innovative and dramatic musicals of the Sixties. The songs, by John Kander and Fred Ebb, are all first-rate and amongst the most professionally theatrical in seasons. ($).

Mimi Farina and Tom Jans

Mimi Farina, once married to Richard Farina went solo after her husband's death; but upon meeting Tom Jans decided to collaborate. Their success is evident in their music and they'll perform Wednesday night in the Blue Wall. For further details, see page 10. ($).

Music Match

Saturday, March 11, there will be an "Instant Karma Tournament" featuring Wiggy, Heavy Maggie, J.D. Mama, Chapel Fog and Cornbread in the Ballroom. ($).

Otis Rush

Black blues musician whose artistry is known by just a few loyal followers. This unfortunate fact hopefully will be remedied this Monday at 8 in the Ballroom when Rush will play. For more see page 10. ($).

Yale Slavic Choruses

On Tuesday, March 14 at 8:00 P.M. in Herter 227 there will be a concert by the Yale Slavic Chorus sponsored by the Department of Slavic Languages and Literatures. The chorus, composed of thirty women, mostly undergraduates at Yale, was formed only two years ago under the auspices of the men's group, the Yale Russian Chorus.

Theater

Celebration

The Lions Share Co is the area's only resident musical theatre company making it's home at the Campus Center UMass. Tonight and tomorrow night at 8:30 the Lions Share will present Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt's Celebration, which is much on the same line as their Fantastics. It will be presented in cabaret style with beverages served. Celebration theme of nature versus urban corruption is augmented by its stylized characters, dynamic mime ensemble work where the actors cause a change of mood or scene, and its exciting current percussive music and dance. For more see review on page twelve.

Little Mary Sunshine

Little Mary Sunshine is a musical comedy for the whole family. It was first produced in New York in 1959 and has been captivating audiences all over the world ever since. Anyone who has sat through such operettas as Rosemarie will find Little Mary Sunshine a hilarious parody. The plot concerns "Big Jim Warrington (our hero) who is pursuing the "evil" Indian, Yellow Feather, (our villain), and with his trusty company of Forest Rangers he comes upon the Colorado Inn, which is owned by Little Mary Sunshine (our heroine). Needless to say complications arise, but one must never fear for honesty and goodness prevail and everyone lives happily ever after.

The musical will be presented tonight and tomorrow evening at 8:30 and tomorrow afternoon at 2. They are either completely sold our or nearly that way. The production will play next weekend and will be reviewed next week. ($).

Much Ado About Nothing

The comedy concerns the wittiest of all Shakespeare's couples, Beatrice and Benedick. These two spend so much time in verbal duels, using clever puns, similes, and epigrams to put each other down, they never realize they are madly in love with each other. A second, more conventional romance is carried on between Claudio, Benedick's best friend, and Hero, Beatrice's cousin. The comedy is completed by the racy punning of ladies-in-waiting, the antics of a slapstick constable and his bumbling watchmen, double entendres by almost everyone, and even the meaness of a villain. Tonight, tomorrow, and Sunday evenings at 8:30 at the Kirby Theater, Amherst College. ($).

Natural Man is a play written by Theodore Browne and directed by Ester Terry about the life of the famous black folk hero JOHN HENRY. The legend of JOHN HENRY and his ten pound hammer has been told and sung around the world. He shook mountains with his powerful hammerblows and dared pit his superhuman strength and endurance against the new day demon, Automation, in one final race winner take all. The troupe has worked very hard to capture the spirit of JOHN HENRY as black people have related to it. The result will be presented by The UMass Black Repetoire Theatre at Bowker Auditorium March 10, and 11, at 8:00 p.m. and on March 12 at 3:00 p.m. ($).

Snowball, Lemonade, and Next

Three one-act off-Broadway plays that deal compassionately and humorously with the themes of loneliness and isolation in modern society will be presented in the Laboratory Theatre, Mt. Holyoke College, Friday, March 10 through Sunday, March 12 at 8:15 p.m. Snowangel by Lewis John Carlino is a gentle, funny play dealing with two lonely people who learn that in order to receive love one must be willing to give of oneself. Lemonade by James Prideaux which explores the illusions and dreams of two midwestern housewives, Margaret Grady and D'Anne Hurd, who, while sitting by the highway selling lemonade, share the fantasies that enliven their drab lives. Terence McNally's Next is a hilarious confrontation between a forty-year-old man who has just received his draft notice and the tough female examining officer at the draft board. ($).

Films

Alice's Restaurant (Jerry Lewis Cinema, Northampton)

Arthur Penn's often funny and touching film interpretation of Arlo Guthrie's hassles with the police in Stockbridge, Mass., and his draft board. When the humor is present, the film captures the wryness of Guthrie's humor yet when the dramatic elements emerge, a rather prolonged subplot concerning Alice and her marital hassles the film becomes a melodramatic mess of missused sociology. Filmed in the area with many of the participants in the original encounter.

Cabaret (Wednesday, Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield)

The most acclaimed film of the year thus far is this film version of the 1967 Broadway musical which mixes decandent, spectacular cabaret-styled entertainment with the rise of Nazism. The musical was hailed on the stage as one of the more innovative and exciting of the past decade and has been transformed, through the skillful hands of Bob Fosse, into a truly unique and stunning film. The story concerns the romantic encounters of a young British writer in the Berlin of the early Thirties, immediately prior to Hitler's takeover. The songs here are dispersed through the action, not the plot, and comment rather than further the story. The effect is the first truly unique film musical in quite some time. The score, by John Kander and Fred Ebb, beautifully echoes the era as does the performances, chiefly those of Liza Minneli as the legendary Sally Bowles and Joel Grey as the epitome of decandence in the form of the Cabaret's Master of Ceremonies.

The Chase (Monday, S U Ballroom, 7 and 9:45)

Somehow this mildly hysterical and glossly melodrama about the lurid private affairs of a Southern town is fascinating and diverting in its own way. The story concerns a sheriff in search of an escaped convict whose return to the town throws a number of leading citizens into a panic. It is thrown together with nearly every cliche about the South imaginable. Still when done by a cast headed by Marlon Brando, Jane Fonda, and Robert Redford it makes for entertaining dross.

Cool Hand Luke (Saturday, Mahar, 7:30 and 10)

An entertaining, if a bit overly symbolic drama about a misfit in a Southern penal colony during the Thirties and his struggle with his sadistic authorities. The humor is deftly underplayed, and the leisurely style blends well with the whole. The only dissonance is the heavy-handed Christian symbolism towards the end, which attempts to turn his affalable victim of self-neglect into an existential martyr. Fortunately the philosophical thickness only slightly mars this otherwise enjoyable and disturbing story of prison life. Paul Newman's Luke is one of his most lideable performances and he is finely supported from Arthur Kennedy, who won an Oscar, and Jo Van Fleet.

Creature From The Black Lagoon (Friday, Hampden Dining Commons, 8 & 10)

An insipid and grossly ridiculous horror film that reeks of clumsy camera tricks, phoney monsters and makeshift murkiness. The creature is a waterlogged amphibian who bumbles around trying to be grotesque, but never becomes more than boringly unimpressive.

Dirty Harry (Showcase Cinema, W Springfield)

Detective Comics in Panavision with Clint Eastwood as a San Franciscan counterpart to crime-fighting the super-hero comic strip characters. A shrewd, taut, well-made thriller that pits Eastwood as Dirty Harry against insane murderer named Scorpio. Harry is something to be seen as he single-handedly quenches a bank robbery without even sweating and Scorpio often does Harry one better in this sharp fantasy thriller. The theme of the film is simplistic dribble about how liberals are responsible for letting culprits like Scorpio out on the streets and the message may be laid on a bit too thick at the end, still those apparent flaws are all but glossed over under the firm, ingenious hand of director Don Seigel.

Doctor Zhivago (Campus Cinemas, Hadley)

A classy and trashy adaptation of Boris Pasternack's novel about a man's struggle against tyranny before and during the Russian Revolution that comes across as an audience's struggle against tedium. Robert Bolt's screenplay meanders through the book like a hasty tour of a large museum, rendering the original to intelligent pulp. David Lean's ponderous and pretentious direction slackens the pace of the film to that of a tired snail. The film is a daytime serial--Cassack Style employing all the razzmatazz of the Class Hollywood Product. The only effective aspect is the photography, the rest comes off as vacuous as the blatantly romantic music score of Maurice Jarre.

Duck Soup (Sunday, Wright Hall, Smith, 2:30 & 4:30)

Probably the best in the Marx Brothers genre of zany and absurd spoofs, this one deals with spies and respective villains. The film also features Margaret Dumont and Louis Calhern, with added gags by Nat Perrin and Arthur Sheekman.

Fiddler on the Roof (Show Case Cinemas, West Springfield)

A mundane version of the longest running musical in Broadway history. The disappointing epic comes away by director Norman Jewison who has employed needless flashy techniques in the transition. The musical becomes bottom-heavy and static when blown up on a Super Panavision screen and blasted out of twelve stereo speakers. The show itself has grace, charm, and a natural warmth that are all but eliminated here. Instead every moment reeks with phony folklines and cornball routines. The excellent Bock-Harnick score has been homogenized in musical interludes embarrassing at best.

The Go-Between (Academy of Music, Northampton)

A distinguished drama that excels in presenting marvelous rendering of Victorian England, some superlative acting, beautiful photography, and is competent enough in all other areas. Still, in the end it seems a bit too competent for its own good. It may have a cache of prizes under its belt and be on a goodly share of Ten Best Lists, it still remains a distinctly cold experience.

Le Grande Illusion (Thursday, Merrill Science Center, Amherst College, 3:30 and 7:30)

Considered by many one of the finest films of all times in Jean Renoir's anti-war masterpiece. It takes place in a German prison camp for officers during the final year of the First World War and insightfully studies the demise of the aristocratic class and style in modern warfare. Many points are subtle as to be transparent, still the ironies of warfare have never been better portrayed. The film features Erich Von Strohiem in his most sympathetic role as the commander of the Prison of War camp and is one of the finest made pacifist films ever created.

Harold And Maude (Calvin Theater, Northampton)

A charmless, insipid black comedy that, believe it or not, comes our way with more sugar frosting than is a sugar frosted nightmare. The film features Ruth Gordon and Bud Cort, she as an eighty year old lifeforce, he as a suicidal twenty year old, who have a love affair. The humor is silly or offensive, the black elements banal, the sentimentality too thick to cut, the performances overblown, the music, courtesy of Cat Stevens flat, the direction one step removed from a television commercial; in short a flat, unappealing, mishmash of clumsily drawn ideas.

The Hospital (Showcase Cinemas, Springfield)

The world of a big city hospital is brought to life in this grim but often funny film that deals with bizarre and exaggerated situations of medical incompetence, the violent aspects of New York City life, and the bitter story of a middle-aged doctor who is suffering from the termination of a bad marriage. The film stars George C. Scott, Diana Rigg, and is directed by Arther Hiller, with script by Paddy Chavefshy.

House of Wax (Friday, Mahar, 6:30, 8:15, 10)

Originally released in 1954 as one of the first three-dimensional films, this little macabre drama about the revenge of a mad museum curator is a cut above the average. Never mind its coming on a bit too heavy, enjoy the three-dimensional effects (which include many perspective shots and one unnecessarily prolonged sequence when a barker bangs his paddle ball down your throat.) Vincent Price is appropriately diabolical as the vengeance-seeking madman.

Jules and Jim (Tuesday, Mahar, 8 & 10)

A brilliant film by the French genius Francoise Truffant that stars Jeanne Monreau and Oscar Werner. The story is a sensative and provocative tale of a

Skaters Div. II Champs

By DAN KAMAL

It was surprisingly easy.

The UMass hockey team dominated the University of Buffalo in every aspect of the ECAC Division II Championship final Saturday night at Orr Rink and came away with a convincing 8-1 decision and the Division II crown.

An overflow, vociferous crowd saw the Redmen come out storming and never let up. It was without a doubt the best game of the season for the skaters. It was a good time to put it all together.

Coach Jack Canniff has been saying all season long that he had the personnel to go all the way in the Division. No one ever doubted that. However, the way the Redmen had been playing before the playoffs began, many people doubted whether the talent within the personnel would display itself enough to bring the championship to this campus.

The players never doubted it. As Pat Keenan said after the game, "We all felt that Buffalo didn't stand a chance against us."

It didn't.

When asked to say a few words during the post-game ceremonies, Canniff heaped all the praise on his players. He mentioned that "They played a hulluva game." He couldn't have put it better.

The "second" line, which had such a tremendous series, opened the scoring for the Redmen early in the first period. Chico Shea, who had an incredible string of bad luck late in the season, took a beautiful pass from Don Riley who was behind the Bulls net, and from about five feet out rammed it past Buffalo goalie Mike Dunn. It was to be the first goal of a hat trick for Shea.

Five minutes later, at 8:42, Chico put UMass up 2-0 with his second goal, this one a tip-in from amidst a maze of players in front of Dunn off a shot from the point by Bob Bartholomew. Riley picked up his second of five assists for the game on this goal.

At this point, the game looked very much like the two previous playoff games at Orr Rink. Both against St Anselm's and Merrimack, the Redmen broke out into early leads.

Keenan increased the Redmen lead late in the period when he took a pass from Jack Edwards. Edwards swept the puck backhand-style to Keenan who was stationed right near the post. Dunn never had a chance, and UMass' record-breaking scorer rammed it home.

The game began to take another familiar turn late in the second period, however. A defensive lapse by UMass gave Buffalo forward Mike Klym the puck at the face-off circle to the left of P.J. Flaherty. With Dale Dolmage screening P.J., Klym unloaded a cannon shot, and it was 3-1.

In both previous playoff games, the Redmen had squandered leads, and it looked as if it would happen again. But at 19:33, Keenan scored the goal that killed the Bulls.

The Weston, Ontario native stuffed a rebound of a shot by Dan Reidy past Dunn and, and with less than half a minute left in the second period, UMass had its three-goal lead back.

To the disinterested hockey observer, the third period might be considered boring. To the biased throng at Orr Rink, it was ecstasy.

Eric Scrafield, who also had trying to clear the puck deep into scored an "unintentional goal" at 2:08. The Red Baron, who was just rying to clear the puck deep into the Buffalo zone as his line went off the ice, shot it on net and got some help from a Bulls defenseman who completely screened goalie Dunn from the play.

This made the score 5-1, and then Shea and Keenan completed their hat tricks in a span of a little more than two minutes.

Scrafield had the honor of scoring the last goal of the season for the Redmen late in the game to make the final 8-1.

By this time, it had become target practice.

In the ceremonies after the game, each member of the Buffalo team received runner-up trophies. The Bulls deserve a lot of credit for their stunning upset over Vermont. Each Redman received his version of the championship trophy, and Brian Sullivan took the big silver cup and skated around the rink, much to the delight of the crowd.

It was the last game as Redmen for 10 seniors, the first senior group recruited by Canniff. They came a long way.

SOS Incorporation With COS Planned

By ROBERT MEDEIROS

Representatives from the UMass and Amherst community met yesterday to discuss incorporating their efforts for the raising of funds in support of 28 parents of residents at the Belchertown State School.

The 28 parents have filed a class-action suit in federal court against the state Department of Mental Health charging that the state has been negligent in the care of residents at Belchertown.

Students Offering Support (SOS)—A UMass student organization-called on representatives from the Amherst community to join them in their efforts to express support and obtain funds for the class-action suit. The meeting was attended by 15 people.

Community Offering Support (COS)-an organization formed in the Amherst community with the identical aims of SOS-will provide the community with a vehicle for expressing support and obtaining funds for the parents.

Yesterday's meeting at the Belchertown State School, which included a 90-minute tour of five buildings at the institution, emphasized plans to formally incorporate SOS and COS into one organization tomorrow at the Amherst Savings Bank.

Incorporation provides legal protection for individuals in SOS and COS. Under Massachusetts law, only the CSOS corporation can be held responsible for the actions of the organization.

Joseph Sylvia, chairman of SOS, said in an interview that SOS and COS despite the incorporation will remain separate in terms of responsibility and funds. He said students know they have taken on a "mammoth job" and realize the support which is needed from the community in order to successfully support the suit.

Sylvia said that during tomorrow's meeting, the incorporates will be announced and officers in the organization will be chosen.

Summing up the goals of the incorporation, Sylvia said: "Students will handle the student aspect and the community will handle the community aspect."

Sylvia said there were presently efforts in the direction of establishing a CSOS throughout Massachusetts. He said a one-day conference is planned for April 8 at UMass in order to acquaint all interested colleges and universities in the state with the issues involved in the suit and the necessary means of establishing a CSOS on their campus.

The tour of the institution, which was organized by Sylvia included "the best and the worst" of buildings at the school, said an SOS representative.

Mike Sullivan, who is vice-chairman of the Amherst Board of Selectmen and a member of COS, said he visited the Belchertown School ten years ago. He said in an interview after the tour: "In ten years the thinking at Belchertown hasn't really changed."

Sullivan found the concept of "big wards and custodial care" especially disagreeable, he said. As he sees it, conditions at Belchertown are much worse than the conditions which are expressed in the newspapers.

"You can't become that dedicated until you have actually been through the place and seen what it is like," said Sullivan. Students have had a great effect in making the Amherst community aware of their responsibilities to the Belchertown School, he continued.

UMass Professor Ben Ricci, who is president of the Belchertown Friends Association and chief organizer of the class-action suit, showed slides from Norway during the meeting, which he said expressed an alternative method of dealing with the retarded.

Ricci said the Scandinavian countries have gotten away from institutional care for the retarded and, instead, depend on residential living and community work-service as the chief alternative methods.

Ricci, explaining his reason for going through the federal courts, said the governor has acted in a "perfunctory manner." He said the state legislature has yielded some fruit, but the time for filing anenactment to implementation is usually too long a time to wait for meaningful reform. We're still working within the system, he said.

In a related development, Federal Judge Francis J.W. Ford last Friday in Boston ordered the state Department of Mental Health to complete all physical examinations of Belchertown School residents by May 1.

He also ordered the state to have a comprehensive treatment plan prepared for every resident by June 10. The Attorney General's office, which represents the state in the case, agreed to each of the orders.

Boston courthouse sources said Judge Ford by not publicly acting on an earlier motion by the state to dismiss the suit, indicated by his actions that he has refused to have the case thrown out of federal court.

The sources also said the state may have eliminated its right to seek a dismissal by agreeing to the orders and may also have eliminated various grounds for appeal.

Irvings Due In Court Today

NEW YORK (AP) — Author Clifford Irving and his wife, Edith, were scheduled to appear Monday in federal and state courts to enter pleas to indictments charging them with a scheme to sell McGraw-Hill, Inc., a "bogus autobiography" of reclusive billionaire Howard Hughes for $750,000.

After an intensive six-week joint county-federal probe, the Irvings and their friend, literary researcher Richard Suskind, were indicted Thursday on a variety of criminal charges arising out of the bizzare compilation of the 230,000 word manuscript.

In the federal indictment, Irving, 41, and his 36-year-old artist wife were charged with conspiracy and mail fraud. Suskind, 46, was named as a co-conspirator but not as a defendant in the federal indictment.

The New York County grand jury charged all three with grand larceny, conspiracy and possession of forged instruments.

A second county grand jury indictment charged Irving and Suskind with perjury. The perjury indictment stemmed from previous state court affidavits in which Irving said he had met Hughes secretly in motels and in automobiles in places ranging from Oaxaca, Mexico, to Pompano Beach, Fla.

Suskind swore in a similar affidavit that on one occasion he met Hughes and the industrialist gave him an organically grown prune.

According to the indictments, Irving and Suskind thought such a hoax would be successful because they believed that either the 66-year-old Hughes was dead or "not of sufficient mental or physical capacity to denounce it."

If convicted, Irving and his wife each could face maximum sentences of five years in prison and a total of $10,000 in fines on the conspiracy count, and five years each in prison and a total of $2,000 on the mail fraud count.

Wallace Predicts Florida Primary Win

MIAMI, Fla. (AP) — George C. Wallace said Sunday he believes he will win Florida's presidential primary, but Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey contended that would have little impact on the race for the White House nomination because the Alabama governor is not "a card-carrying Democrat."

Sen. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine, battling to bolster a national campaign that shows signs of sagging, switched his position and announced he will disclose within 10 days contributions to his presidential bid.

Florida's big field of Democratic entries campaigned on television and on tour for Tuesday's 11-way primary contest.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington claimed he is gaining strength in the Florida race and is now "all bunched up" with Humphrey and Muskie in a race for second place behind Wallace, who holds hefty leads in the public opinion polls.

"I believe that I will be the winner on Tuesday," Wallace said in the ABC program "Issues and Answers." "I feel that we have an excellent chance to win a majority of the delegates in Florida."

Eighty-one will be at stake in Tuesday balloting expected to pull a big turnout among Florida's two million Democratic voters.

Wallace said he may campaign in as many as 10 more Democratic primaries, probably including California on June 6, and possibly Ohio on May 2.

"I intend to go to California at the present time if we run well in Florida," he said.
